RURAL WATER SUPPLIES

FEW Government Bills have been presented to this Parliament, chiefly, no doubt, because Ministers feel far from sure of themselves or the policies that they can safely pursue with such a slender Parliamentary majority. But one measure introduced last week will be approved on all sides as a necessary step forward in bringing piped water to rural areas. This Bill will increase to £45 million the present limit of £15 million for Government grants to local authorities in England and Wales. The whole of the £15 million has been promised to local authorities carrying out schemes of water supply and sewerage, although the amount actually paid so far is only about £3 million. Comprehensive schemes, covering several parishes, take many months to plan and carry out, and so local authorities should be assured now that if they prepare further schemes they will qualify for a Government grant. It is a condition of the 1944 Act that the county councils shall also make a contribution; thus the burden of financing these schemes is as widely spread as possible.

About one-third of all country-dwellers are still without a piped water supply. The housewife who has to make countless journeys in all weathers to fetch water from a well or a pump and the family who have to endure antiquated methods of sanitation know how real is the need for further schemes. Each political party has promised to give rural water supply and drainage the highest possible priority, but progress has been slow. The Ministry of Health, and now the Ministry of Local Government and Planning, have taken unconscionably long in approving schemes put forward by the rural district councils, requiring them to be so comprehensive that endless delays are encountered. And finally, as often as not, the schemes have to be re-cast because their cost is prohibitive. Fully comprehensive schemes look well on paper, but in these matters it is wise to rely on the judgment of local people who know where the need is most urgent and which schemes, or sections of schemes, should come first. There are parts of the country which are never likely to be served by public water-supply and sewerage schemes, but there are also many villages where living conditions could be speedily improved by carrying out quite modest projects. It is these that should benefit by the extra financial provision which Parliament is now to be asked to make.

Much more has been done in the last ten years to provide piped water for cattle than for human beings. The Ministry of Agriculture has a comparatively simple procedure for approving farm water-supply grants. The farmer makes his application to the county agricultural executive committee; they send out their water supplies officer to make a survey and ensure that the benefits in increased stocking capacity will justify the expenditure, and in the course of a few weeks or months the Government grant is promised on completion of the work. Many thousands of acres which could not before be stocked for ley grazing have, thanks to water-supply grants, been brought into a fully productive crop rotation that ensures the maintenance of soil fertility. A good supply of piped water is a necessity, too, for the dairy farm, and much improvement has been effected in this way during the last decade. Here the problem of disposing of effluent may arise, but in very few cases is this as serious as the sewerage problem that always arises when a village gets a main-water supply.

There remains unsolved, and this Bill does nothing to help, the fundamental problem of conserving and using the nation's water supplies to the best advantage. Public interest is aroused spasmodically when projects like the Enborne Valley reservoir scheme are brought forward, but major decisions are repeatedly shelved. Before long the whole problem of water supplies, rural and urban, will have to be tackled.

THE DELL

HERE, where the great field
Sweeps towards the sky,
The land is ploughed and tilled,
The green corn springs,
Larks sing above it
And above the gold
Of changing harvest
On exultant wings!

And here the field holds,
Cupped in her eager hands,
Through summer and winter
To spring's white blossoming hour,
The untamed hollow
That defies the plough,
A tangled fortress
Of free life and flower,
And keeps its secret
For the passing skies.

EILEEN A. SOPER.

THE FUTURE OF COMMONS

ACCORDING to some people common lands are survivals from a past state of society which bear no relation to modern needs. They should, it is said, be "bulldozed" and converted into ordinary farm land. Among those who naturally disagree are the members of the Commons, Open Spaces and Footpaths Preservation Society. In the Society's Annual Report, published recently, the opinion is given that under existing legislation—largely as a result of the Society's efforts—commons can be considered as adequately protected from enclosure. The exceptions are those which were requisitioned for the production of food during the war and which, under the Agriculture Act of 1947, can now be acquired by the Ministry for permanent cultivation. The Minister, it must be remembered, is not only the Minister of Agriculture but also the statutory protector of commons and common rights, and it is encouraging to find him in almost complete agreement with the Society over these particular cases. In the majority it is agreed that the weight of the argument was on the Ministry's side, and 18 commons are now in process of being acquired for permanent cultivation, instead of being de-requisitioned. In three important cases, however, the Ministry has given way, and the 347 acres of common at Chipping Sodbury, in Gloucestershire, the 410 acres of Hatherleigh Moor, in Devon, and 198 acres at Kempsey, in Worcestershire, are now to be freed from requisition. In all these three there exists an authority responsible for keeping the common in good condition, and the moral drawn is that if we wish to save our commons we must see that common rights are well used and the commons properly cared for.

PUBLIC PATHS AND OPEN COUNTRY

THE Commons, Open Spaces and Footpaths Preservation Society, as its name indicates, is also vitally interested in the preservation of footpaths and bridleways; and the survey of rights-of-way which it is now the duty of local planning authorities to prepare under the National Parks Act has given it an opportunity of organising local voluntary effort in all parts of the country to assist in the survey and check the accuracy of its results. The responsible authorities have, with one exception, accepted both help and advice with gratitude, and it would be a thousand pities if this harmony were irretrievably marred by the action of a single county council. This same council has also shown some reluctance to carry out its obligation to repair (under Section 47 of the Act) a footbridge to which the Society has drawn attention. The Highways Committee concerned, ignoring the fact that it was dealing with a statutory duty expressly imposed and not with a discretionary power which the council could exercise or not, took the view that local authorities should not be called upon to spend money putting paths and bridges into condition merely for the use of "a few hikers from London." It seems possible that such an attitude is not unconnected with a fear that the whole of the provisions of Part V of the Act, dealing with access to open country, may cause harm to agriculture. There seems little cause for such alarm, and it is to be hoped that wiser counsels will prevail. As was explained in Parliament, the "review" of "open country" by a local planning authority does not create any public rights of access, which comes into being only if the authority makes an access agreement or order. In Section 62 of the Act there is a list of kinds of "excepted land" to which no access agreement or order can apply, and this includes all agricultural land "other than such land which is agricultural land by reason only that it affords rough grazing for livestock." This, surely, means that the only kind of farm land to which the public can obtain rights of access is land to which they can do no harm.

OIL IN COASTAL WATERS

AS the Annual Report of the British section of the International Committee for Bird Preservation shows, the problem of pollution of coastal waters by waste oil from ships is little, if any, nearer solution. Every year a world conference or other international meeting discusses the question, but the evil continues virtually unchecked, and birds and fish are destroyed, beaches and shipping continue to be fouled and considerable damage is done to plant life. And all this in spite of the fact that most nations, including our own, have passed laws prohibiting the discharge of oil within their territorial waters. In some waters where the tankers and larger ships have been the worst offenders economic causes are having some effect, and at the last World Conference, held in Sweden, both Scandinavian and British representatives reported an improvement due to the greatly increased cost of oil. The big tankers and liners can no longer afford to let waste oil go overboard; it is cleaned and used again. Small boats and fishing vessels, particularly in more or less enclosed waters, now appear to cause most trouble, and propaganda might with profit be directed to their owners and crews.

ONE LEG-BYE

THE happily browsing searcher after cricket records in Wisden will find, under the heading of "Small Totals," that Oxford were once dismissed by the M.C.C. and Ground for a mere 12, a score equalled by Northamptonshire against Gloucestershire. Those records, however, refer to first-class matches, and for the really sensational one must go to the humbler walks of cricketing life. How pleasant it would have been to watch the recent match between Bookham and the Electrical Trades Commercial Travellers' Association. The Travellers batted first and whether or not any of their bats made contact with the ball is not known, but the only run that was scored was one leg-bye. The Bookham team, if not, in the language of another game, actually dormy, were thus in a highly favourable position. The first ball bowled by the Travellers went for four byes and the match was over without a run scored from the bat on either side. The Travellers did not at this point, as did the Dingley Dellers at Muggleton, surrender to the superior prowess of their adversaries. In a truly sportsmanlike spirit they allowed Bookham to finish their innings—for 57 runs. In all 16 ducks were scored in the two innings, and that is possibly yet another record.

A COUNTRYMAN'S NOTES

By

Major C. S. JARVIS

IN June I usually travel north to Wales to try for salmon, which during that month are supposed to be found in the tributaries of the Conway that flow down from the heights around Snowdon, and this year I felt confident that lack of water, which prevents the fish from moving up to the higher reaches, would not put many of the best pools out of action, as it has done so often in the past. I was surprised, therefore, to be warned that conditions this season are quite as bad as they were in 1950, when there was a very light rainfall during the early months of the year, and I am postponing my visit until further rain puts the rivers into a fit state for the expected run of fish.

These reports are confirmed by a correspondent who farms in the vicinity of Beddgelert, on the opposite side of Snowdon, and who complains of the general drying up of the many small streams on his land, and of the resulting poor grazing for his flocks of sheep. According to the weather reports of the last six months or so, North Wales has experienced as much rain as the south of England, which means that the rainfall there has been the heaviest on record. More than that, deep snow covered all the mountains for the greater part of the winter, and further falls continued until late in the spring. The semi-drought conditions that obtain in this watershed, on which the North Wales hydro-electric scheme mainly depends, almost immediately after a dry spell has set in must cause the engineers who planned this expensive undertaking to wonder if they will obtain the storage water that is necessary to produce the power they require. Statistics no doubt prove that the average rain over a period of years is ample for their requirements, but it is undeniable, as is proved by the present conditions, that in Snowdonia the mountain slopes, down which the many small streams flow, now dry out far more rapidly than they did in the past.

SEVERAL readers of COUNTRY LIFE who two years ago put in a claim to the Ministry of Town and Country Planning for loss of development rights on their land have no doubt now received a notification from the Central Land Board that the development value of their property has been determined, and that a sum representing the difference between its unrestricted and restricted value has been agreed upon. In the only example that has come to my immediate notice, I am informed that the figure at which the lost development rights are assessed is quite satisfactory, but that this is followed by a statement that "it should not be taken as indicating the amount of any payment that may be made in respect of the claim. This is a matter for the Treasury Scheme for the distribution of payments." The actual compensation that will be paid depends, of course, entirely on whether the £300,000,000 allotted is sufficient to meet all the claims in full, and it would require a grade A prophet to foretell if this will be so, or whether the amount indicated will enable compensation to be paid only at the rate of one half or less of the sums recognised by the Central Land Board. I have heard various forecasts made by those who are presumably qualified to give an opinion, and they vary from payment at a full hundred per cent. to a shilling in the pound, if that. The situation will be in the nature of a reductio ad absurdum if the owner of a small plot who has his lost development rights assessed at £300 receives £30 as full compensation and later, when he builds a house on the plot, is charged, not £30, but the full £300.

UNDER this scheme there is an arrangement by which the Central Land Board pay a contribution towards the fees of professional advisers who have made claims on behalf of clients. In the case I have quoted this has already been done, and the fee paid to the agent who filled in the claim form is generous to a degree, since it is approximately six times the recognised charge for such work. One has an uneasy feeling that if all the professional advisers are to be paid at this rate there will be a very considerable hole knocked in the £300,000,000 before the distribution of compensation to landowners starts.

THE mixed reception that again this year seems to have been accorded to the pictures in the Royal Academy has been a feature of the exhibition since its earliest days. One of my boyhood recollections is of my father's reactions to some of the works that he had seen on the walls. These to a certain extent were due to the fact that he was a passable amateur water-colourist himself, and that it was not every year that the selection board found among the pictures that he had submitted one that came up to the standard required.

Modernist painting seems to cause as much heated correspondence in our newspapers as the wholemeal-white loaf controversy, but all the letters in the world will not alter the opinions of the two schools of thought—those who say they understand modern art and those who do not. One imagines that among the reasons why the average artist paints a picture is that he wishes to sell it at the highest price obtainable. With this end in view it is probably advisable to paint something which will appeal to prospective buyers, most of whom want something pleasing and decorative to add to the attraction of a room. This type of purchaser, being uninstructed in very modern art, likes a picture that he can understand, such as a landscape of a part of the countryside that he esteems which is a landscape, and not a reproduction of an up-to-date American tie. In the same way he fails to appreciate and see the charm of a portrait of a human being who is suffering from some physical distortion. Personally, being very old-fashioned, I have never understood why a modern artist paints a picture of a man with one arm twice as large as the other, or of a woman with one eye set at the corner of her mouth. I know that elephantiasis, that disease which is caused by infection from the bite of a culex mosquito, and which is common in the Middle East, does cause these hideous distortions, but why perpetuate them in a picture?

THE ENJOYMENT OF CAVES

By GEOFFREY GRIGSON

CAVES are like islands. They exert a force upon every one of us, negative, or more likely positive. You may be repelled by caves—know someone who can never be dragged farther than the entrance to a cave no matter how bizarre and exciting it may promise to be from the outside. Probably in stronger or weaker degrees they will fascinate you; for reasons which must no doubt be left finally to the psycho-analyst. But I doubt if any human being can ever be indifferent to the spelæological mysteries. I do not write myself as any one of the varieties of expert devotee, as pot-holer, or geologist or archaeologist or biologist. I confess even to a weakness for show caverns with electric light, and certainly for caves which can be explored without ropes and too much athleticism. Enough to know that there are unmapped penetralia, since mystery is the essence.

Penetralia are the "innermost parts of a temple or shrine." Caves have often been shrines evilly or benignly inhabited, places for nymphs, dragons, trolls, giants, fairies, prophets and witches, major and minor deities, hermits and robbers. Their force cannot be explained away by any cold statement that a cave is a natural phenomenon, a tunnel in limestone eaten out "as a result of the solvent action upon calcium carbonate of water charged with carbon dioxide." It is a fact worth knowing, but it is no more than to say that caves are caves. You can be superior. You can pronounce that the taste for caves was a portion of that European romanticism which is now dead or dying. True and untrue, because the romantic period from the 18th century onwards was simply one in which certain persistent human tendencies were exaggerated and laid bare. Romantic painters and poets—and even, since they existed (and exist), romantic scientists—were all possessed by the elemental mysteriousness; and a cold world without mystery would not be worth living in.

There is more point in remembering certain facts which are all tied together. Here are a few of them. The old Stone Age paintings of the French and Spanish caves are obviously magical or religious. The Gospels talk of the infant Christ being in a house and being laid in a manger. The house or stable was soon transmuted into a cave. It is so in several of the later Infancy Gospels, as in the Gospel of the pseudo-Matthew in which an angel makes Mary go into a dark cave, which at once begins to shine before the child is born. The pre-European people of the Canary Islands mummified their dead and buried them in caves. In one of the South Devon caves (which ought to be better known), the Pixies' Hole at Chudleigh, there is a stalagmite formation called the Pope's Head; and a tradition, perhaps of some antiquity, enjoins that you must stick a pin into it to avoid trouble with the pixies. And so on.

Once you begin to add up facts of this kind, when you recall Keats writing of sleep as the great key

*To Golden Palaces, strange minstrelsy, Fountains grotesque, new trees, bespangled
caves,
Echoing grottoes, full of tumbling waves,
And moonlight; aye, to all the mazy world
Of silvery enchantment,*

and when you remember the ubiquity of caves in children's books (even in the current adventures of Dan Dare, the Pilot of the Future, on Venus), you can construct the mood, the basic mood at any rate, for exploring all the many limestone caves of England and Wales and Ireland. Construct is the wrong word. Either you can enjoy the mood or you cannot; and if you can, it will not matter whether the cave is long or short, vast or minute, in a desert or round the corner. The penetralia are not an absolute requirement. I climbed once to the face of a grey limestone escarpment in County Clare in which the dark hole of a cave was showing. It possessed a chamber about the size of a small pantry reached by a tunnel about as long as the passage from the front door of a council house. No stalactites hung from the roof; there were no coloured formations glissading down the walls. But as a cave it was immensely satisfying, partly perhaps from its situation, from the ancient elder trees which grew round the entrance, the ivy which hung across the dark like a woman's hair, and the shape of the entrance, which was regularity within irregularity.

As a contrast, externally at least, try Phelps's Cavern in the pink limestone of Brixham. I was told to go to a street above the harbour, an odd place for a cave, which made me disbelieve the man on the driving seat of a dust cart or dust lorry, who gave me directions. But the cave was there all right, between the steps of two houses in a long row. A painted wooden door, as it might be to a coal hole, in a white-washed wall. "Phelps's Cavern" was inscribed on the door, and the cave obviously went underneath the houses, as oddly as if it opened off a back street in Camden Town. I have never gone inside. There was no one in the house, and the cave anyway was closed for the winter. All we could do was peer over the top of the door and see steps disappearing into the gloom past two decayed foxes' masks. But I have never found a cave entrance more bizarre, or one—a great point, I think, with caves—which more perfectly contrasted the superficial world of light with the subterranean world of darkness.

Perhaps the best of all caves are those which have water running inside them or out of them, combining symbols or principles of mystery and life or even of death and life. The roll of the Axe out of Wookey Hole in the Mendips (of which there is an admirable water-colour by Michael Angelo Rooker in the Victoria and Albert Museum) is perhaps as moving as anything of its kind in the British Isles. Yordas Cave, not so far away from Ingleton in the West Riding, contains not only a stream running from nowhere to nowhere, but a waterfall which thunders down in a niche, making draught enough to blow out your candle. Caves of this kind appealed to Wordsworth (who visited Yordas and wrote of it) and to Coleridge. Wordsworth liked streams new-born and coming out to light. When his friend William Westall, the artist, published his Views of the Caves near Ingleton, Gordale Scar, and Malham Cove (a scarce book well worth possessing), it suggested to him three sonnets about the Yorkshire limestone. Pure element of waters! the first one began,

... wheresoe'er

*Thou dost forsake thy subterranean haunts,
Green herbs, bright flowers, and berry-bearing plants,*

Rise into life and in thy train appear:

And through the sunny portion of the year,

Swift insects shine, thy hovering pursuivants.

The description would fit a hundred caves within a few miles of Yordas or round the skirts of Ingleborough. The sonnet closes rather more sentimentally. The waters from the cave were felt in man's perturbed soul—

And, haply, far within the marble belt

Of central earth, where tortured Spirits pine

For grace and goodness lost, thy murmurs melt

Their anguish,—and they blend sweet songs

with thine.

Streams murmuring within the marble belt of central earth, far into the penetralia—Coleridge felt them as well. I daresay his emotion about English caves which give birth to streams had to do with the "caverns measureless to man," in Kubla Khan, through which ran Alph the sacred river, though he was also recalling the Questiones Naturales in which Seneca writes about the Alphaeus, and rivers flowing beneath the ground from a vast sea in the depths of the earth.

Among the dry caves in the limestone there are several in South Devon which ought to be visited, although the only one of them which the world knows of is Kent's Cavern (Kent's Hole is the earlier and, I think, the better name) at Torquay. Inland from Torquay and Brixham and eastward from Plymouth there are considerable deposits of Middle Devonian limestone, ranging in colour from grey to purple and pink and red. Here and there the rock is being quarried and crushed for road stone, making scarps or cliffs of fresh pink like a monthly rose, as on the side of Berry Head, under the old fort, facing Torquay. It is this limestone which gives us Kent's Cavern and Phelps's Cavern and the Pixies' Hole in the tall mass of Chudleigh Rock which rises above A 38, the main road towards Cornwall, south-west of Exeter. But many of the Devon caves are not marked on the ordnance maps. There are others near the Pixies' Hole, including the Chudleigh Cavern and the Cow Hole. A few miles down A 38 there is a cave up to the left at Pridhamsleigh and several more near Buckfastleigh—Reed's Cave, Rock House Cave, Rick Cave, and Baker's Pit Cave. Overhead to the west of the road rises Dartmoor. So the caves come as a surprise when you think of Devon too much in terms of granite. How curiously, too, these South Devon caves contrast with the caves opening on to the bare grey desert of the limestone in Burren, in County Clare, or around Ingleborough, in Yorkshire! Fertility lies about them, rich fields, rich valleys, and abundant greenery of trees. Chudleigh Rock is muffled around with trees. Even Kent's Cavern, in suburban Torquay, complete with car park, garden, ticket office and shop, faces over the valley towards a still open and green hillside.

The Devon caves, living waters apart, exert all the mysterious and intellectual fascination possible to caverns, as anyone who is curious may discover from articles about them in the Transactions of the Devonshire Association for 1949. Kent's Cavern, guides and floodlighting or no, is a site of importance to the world. It is more than a hundred years since Father McEnery found worked flints among the bones of such extinct animals as the woolly rhinoceros, the cave lion, the cave bear, and the mammoth. So the antiquity of man was pushed back far beyond Archbishop Ussher's confident and precise 17th-century statement that the world had been created in 4004 B.C., or the even more precise dogma that the creation took place at 9 a.m. on October 23, 4004 B.C. Extinct animals lived also in the caves at Chudleigh; and—no doubt an element in the old awesomeness of caves—horseshoe bats use these and other Devon antres for hibernating. Members of the Devon Speleological Society have been ringing bats, studying their parasites, and investigating the caves for those stranger cavernicolous animals adapted to a life in the dark which are more common in the great caves of the karst limestone of the Adriatic and of Yugoslavia.

It does not do to despise the show caves or to sneer at their commercialisation. As you can see from names carved on cave walls in Yorkshire, the Peak, Devon and elsewhere, the curious sightseer has been attracted into caves for hundreds of years. In Kent's Cavern I believe the earliest date on the wall goes back to Elizabethan times. The sightseers went away with stalactites and petrifications. Through the centuries cave after cave was stripped in its more accessible parts. The still wonderful little cave of Gatekirk, near Chapel-le-dale, in

A GREATER HORSESHOE BAT IN ROCK HOUSE CAVE, BUCKFASTLEIGH

Yorkshire, was more wonderful still two hundred years ago when petrifications hung down like hams and neat's tongues and the "mangled limbs of the unhappy victims" of a Polypheme. Others stood up "like virgins or children represented in alabaster." Every one of them has vanished, leaving nothing but the sheer mystery of the cave and the green or blue or purple light which filters in through the entrance. Charles Cotton, indeed, complains in his poem The Wonders of the Peake which he published in 1681, of the way in which visitors to the Derbyshire caves stole the incrustations. To see limestone caves unwrapped in these days, either you must become adept at pot-holing and swim and squeeze and descend by rope ladder into the virgin penetralia, or you must pay your money cheerfully at Cheddar, or Kent's Cavern, or Wookey Hole, or Clapham, and endure the parrot repetitions of the guides and all their demonstration of witches and seven dwarfs, and camels, and elephants in calcium carbonate.

The commercialisation and lighting of caves has had one excellent and curious result. Where the strong lights go on, green patches of moss and fern—hart's-tongue fern which has a preference for limestone—spread across the rock as brilliant as malachite. Guides are adept at the tall story. A guide in Kent's Cavern pointed out one of these malachite patches and told his party that the lighting had brought to life seeds which had lain on the rock for millions of years without a chance to grow. Obviously minute spores of hart's-tongue and moss are for ever being carried into the caves on the faint air currents which wander around them. However intermittent, there is light enough for the chlorophyll in the plantlets to do its photosynthetic work, to assimilate carbon from the air, way in from the sunlit world, and manufacture the starch and so on which the plants require for their food. It is a fact Wordsworth would have enjoyed and would have dignified into a symbol.

AN ANGLER NEVER LIES

By JOCELYN OLIVER

*Lord give me grace to catch a fish
So large that even I
When talking of it afterwards
May never need to lie.*

SUCH is the Angler's Prayer inscribed upon the calendar given to me by my children at Christmas; and because of the fat little plaster trout it also carries, "bedecked and bedizened like Pharaoh's wife," with spots of red, of gold, of (curiously probable) sapphire blue (just such a gay, plump little trout as I hope to see multiplied in the flesh, tenfold and a hundred-fold, before the season is done) I am really too pleased with it to feel the least bit hurt. I care not a tittle for that "even I."

But what a foolishness it all is, to be sure, this fable of the angling lie! What if it has been going on ever since the time of Noah—ever since Noah felt that same sickening break of the line that has sped the high hopes of all of us upon occasion, felt the break and saw the vast black hulk of Leviathan arch, then disappear beneath the waters in final elusion, and, laying down his rod, made the true angler's tic-tac to Ham, Shem, and Japhet, who had heard his excited shouts? Was there lie in that, the first authenticated case of arm-wide computation? No, indeed.

Michael Traherne, in Be Quiet and Go a-Angling, spoils an otherwise magnificent book by suggesting that anglers may, from time to time, exaggerate. Herein surely lies the fatal venom of appeasement. I will have none of it. No, no: if this "shameful schlander" is ever to be scotched, nothing less than an ils ne passeront pas will do. Anglers, then, I insist, do not lie; they do not exaggerate; they do not need to.

Of course, the one-that-got-away is always a big one. Let any angler who has ever been into a big fish tell of the sheer, imponderable, underwater weight of that big fish against fine tackle, quite apart from the rhinocerosoid strength that hurtles that weight away down stream as blithely as biffing a shuttlecock; and then, as an honest man (that is, as an angler) let him confess his stupefaction, his dazed disbelief, on the few-and-far-between occasions when such a fish has not got away.

Anglers, I repeat, never need to lie. What tales they could unfold, what Munchausen, what election-candidate tales, did they but choose to dip into that well of wonders that is every angler's memories. I myself, for instance: I must be one of the few men who have ever caught snipe on a Peter Ross, yet so I have; on the shores of Loch Doon, it was, where I was walking with rod up on my shoulder, line and cast bowstring-taut behind me in the bonny Doon wind—and suddenly, there he was, the little fellow, foul-hooked in the wing. (And lest there be any disgusting doubters, let me add that he was released by my wife, and sped upon his way to the wondrous pitiful obligato of her sighs; and that to my wife a lie is unthinkable). I rarely remember to tell this story, simply because it happened: its truth has robbed it of interest for me. Whereas, had I made it up I should tell it everywhere.

Again, were I in one of my moods of raconter I might narrate how on one occasion I fought and conquered the record gudgeon of all time. "Is it e'en so?" asks the sceptic. It is e'en so. I do not often dwell upon the incident, for I am a modest man (I am an angler) but it was upon a day this many a long year past, and I at an age when Kent Carr and Gunby Hadath had inculcated in me a positively "Fire first, Gentlemen of France" sense of chivalry and sportsmanship. So I put him back. Yea, verily did I put him back, for at that nestling-age I knew him not for what he was. I thought him nothing more than an undersized, nondescript little object and I put him back; the sense faints picturing it. I can see him now, with his thoroughbred's tilt of brow, the elfin naïveté of eye, the undercarriage of the lips, the whole expression an exactly-so. Yes, here in very truth was gudgeon, gudgeon proudly carrying, moreover, his every dram of a four-and-a-half-ounce record.

No, I have never met the angling-liar; the potential angling-liar once, it may be. Come gather round me. At about the time of the gudgeon coup de maître I was in receipt of one penny a week (with which, let me tell all natters about the bad old days, it was possible to buy four separate ounces of four quite different kinds of sweets), and I returned from the war with the intervening years somehow, mysteriously, missing.

There are not many trout in the free water of the Coln below Thorney Weir; nevertheless, in the mayfly time trout are to be had there, and good trout, by wading combined with Tarzan imitations in and out the low-hung boughs of willows. One day I was vexed by the presence of a singularly nasty small boy, who was not only using improper tackle (for it was the close season for floats; the mayfly comes up at West Drayton on May 13 with princely punctuality) but was whistling a song in all the flats. Then I forgot him as several fish began to rise in careless abandon, and lo! it was one of those days. Again and again, and forever again—less than half an hour, and there they lay upon the bank: one of 3½ lb., another of 2¾ lb., two more of just over 2 lb. apiece. You know the free water of the Coln? Then you know just what a day that was.

I had forgotten the whistler all this while, but my ear now informed me that he was close at hand, and so he was, scrofulous, adenoidal, unwashed. He was staring at my trophies, and he was still whistling, but now it was the whistle wolverine; and, "Give you half a dollar each for them, mister!" offered the atomy (and I, remembering my penny-a-week, thought, "Cricket!—what sort of a country's this I've come back to?") and I could see, forming behind that receding forehead, the Lie, the comic-paper lie, the music-hall lie of all time, the lie of the man-who-bought-them-at-the-fish-shop-to-say-he'd-caught-them-himself.

Well, the Lie was not given a chance of life that day. Whether the seed then sown germinated one day to flower into the Lie, I know not. I doubt it. I prefer to think that the child shortly afterwards gave up angling and went in for motor-salesmanship instead, for he was no true angler—not because he was no purist, but because no true angler could ever possibly whistle as flat as that.

And once I had the strange experience of sensing that my own word was doubted. The scene now was one of those enchantingly pretty Indian tanks from which almost anything may emerge. In the course of some weeks' industrious fishing, I was to catch, on rod-and-line, a turtle, a brace of water-snakes, and something so disproportionately toothy that if crocodile wasn't its generic name it should have been. It was my first experience of fishing in such water, and I was expectant; not so my Commanding Officer, who, basking in the shadow of a mango, was getting flying-tips from a pied kingfisher pretending to be a helicopter.

I opened my score with a puny little object, appropriately the white of Indian silver, flat as a penny, with fringe of fin completely encircling it and giving it the homely, friendly look of Oom Paul Kruger.

"Look," I cried, triumphant, "there are fish in these tanks."

The C.O. was kind; he smiled tolerantly; he almost patted me on the head; he almost said "Well done!" or "Very pretty!" Chagrined, I replaced my prey. Ten minutes later it was I who was smiling tolerantly, for now I was holding (holding it at shoulder-level to keep it off the ground, and I am a tall man) certainly the longest fish I have ever caught in my life. The longest, yes; yet its weight was but as thistledown. Here was no girth to pair with length: it was but another Oom Paul, ten times as long as the first but hardly thicker. From a half-inch-wide backbone it tapered to a belly with which one could have shaved oneself. Not till now had "flatfish" been a pregnant term.

Well, the question of glass cases does not arise amid the swamps of Eastern Bengal, so I had it sent round to the Mess, proposing, from my generous heart, to vary for once the general menu of bully-beef hash. I went into the Mess early that evening and it may be that over the preliminary gin I boasted somewhat of the afternoon's contest.

"Nearly as big as I am!" I crowed, at the same time making the arm movements requisite for such recitals. "I wish you could have seen it—"

"I wish we could have seen it, too!" said an oaf of a Code-and-Cypher officer, hateful disbelief in his little piggy eyes.

Looking around me for indignant sympathy, I was startled—I was appalled—to see the same disbelief in other eyes as well. Stung, I said: "Come along to the kitchen, then—maybe they haven't cut it up yet." And I led the way for that procession of half-baked infidels. "Fish!" I demanded of the bobberji. "My fish. Big fish," and my arms thrust themselves nearly from their sockets.

"Big fish?—atcha, sahib!"

"You him cook?"

"Nai, sahib."

"Him fetch"; and as we waited I felt much as Moses must have done as the plagues began to fall thick and heavy upon Egypt. I was about to be vindicated. Where had been sneers, now would be eulogies.

The bobberji returned, smirking like a Gauguin sunset, and carrying a platter. On it were two very small, uncooked fishcakes.

"All him make," he explained, with a deprecating hitch of his shoulders; and as I remembered that knife-edge belly remonstrance died unspoken. For two was just about the maximum number of fishcakes that so thin a fish very well could have made.

A PROJECT THAT SET LONDON TALKING

By HOOLE JACKSON

IN the madcap, stock-jobbing era of the South Sea Bubble, when company after company was launched and people's pockets were picked daily by imaginative scoundrels, one particular "bubble" scheme made London a draw, attracting tourists from the Continent, and, what was more remarkable still, putting money into the pockets of its shareholders. The shares rose from the original value of £4 to £50, and the Company lasted from 1725 to 1731. The scheme, which would be commonplace to-day, was an amazing and daring innovation in 1725. A locksmith, Thomas Newcomen, of Dartmouth, in Devon, had just invented his steam-pumping beam-engine, which was used for the first time in the Great Work Mine at Breage, in conspirators have purchased two enormous dragons from the desert of Lybia of such monstrous size that the tail of one of 'em is a mile and a half long, which they have brought into this metropolis incognito, by the assistance of a conjurer, whom they have employed in that matter. Most of the nerves and sinews come from Sweden; the greatest part of the head from Norway; the joints, veins, and arteries were brought from Derbyshire; the breast from Worcestershire, and the back and wings from Kent, Berkshire and Hertfordshire; the belly from Cornwall, and the greatest part of the tail from the west country, except the thick end next to the body, which, together with the snout and teeth, came out of Sussex by the sea, and

December 20, 1725. The news caused Necklace to remark that "on Monday, a Lancashire wizard with long black hair and grim visage will for some hours feed the eldest dragon with live coals, and a Welshman bred on top of Penmaenmawr will lay hold of the bridle to direct the motion of the creature. Then on a sudden the monster will clap his wings with prodigious force, and so terrible will be the noise thereof, that it will be heard as far as Calais, if the wind set right. The next disaster will be occasioned by the Welshman, who will cry 'Boh!' to make the dragon drink, who immediately dipping his two heads into the Thames, will suck out thence such a prodigious quantity of water that barges will never after Cornwall, and the scheme was to supply Marylebone and the new buildings near Hanover Square and some 1,000 other houses with water pumped from the Thames to a lead cistern at the top of a wooden tower through iron pipes and thence down through other pipes to wooden pipes laid under the streets.

The Water Company of York Buildings became the talk of the town and met with heavy opposition from those who feared pollution of the atmosphere, or, worse, a fearful explosion. For example Read's Weekly Journal of December 18, 1725, published a long diatribe against the scheme, entitled "The York Buildings Dragons, or a full and true account of a most horrid and barbarous murder intended to be committed on Monday on the bodies, goods, and name of the greatest part of His Majesty's liege subjects dwelling and inhabiting between Temple Bar in the East, and St. James's in the West, and between Hungerford Market in the South, and St Mary-le-bone in the North, by a set of evil-minded persons, who do assemble twice a week to carry out their wicked purposes, in a private room over a stable by the Thames side, in a remote corner of the town."

The writer, who signed himself Anodine Necklace, Secretary on behalf of "a club of ingenious gentlemen," declared: "Now these passed by the Custom House, for some outlandish curiosity, imported by some virtuosos of Great Britain. And you know natural knowledge is so much encouraged that such things never pay any duty, but pass unexamined."

However, in spite of the opposition, Newcomen's engine was duly erected in the great tower that rose on the north bank of the Thames and the Water Company began pumping on be able to go through the bridges; the wharfs will become useless from Steel Yard to Millbank; and the tide will not rise high enough to fill the basins of a set of good-natured gentlemen who have been at immense pains to serve the new buildings with water."

Necklace fulminates about the smoke: "This smoke being ponderous will descend upon all the neighbouring inhabitants, and being elastic will spread and fall upon all the evergreens within ten miles of London, and being fuliginous will discolour their hue. Happy the ladies who have papered up all their furniture before they went out of town! Happy the stationers who have timely shut up their shops to preserve their paper! And thrice happy the washerwomen who have closed up and pointed the garret-windows where they have hung up their linen clothes to dry. Besides all this, the sulphureous particles arising from the coals will be so pernicious to the lungs of all who suck them in, they will break several blood-vessels with coughing."

After concluding that the cities of London and Westminster will lose sight of one another, and that only the link-boys are likely to benefit, the article describes the Thames water as "Foetidocabbageous, deaddoggitious, Fish-street-hillious, Drurylaneious, issueplasterious." The author ends with these words: "These conspirators are enemies of the souls as well as the bodies, by setting up a new kind of Popery, and among other things they have a ceremony much like transubstantiation, for by the mixture of Ceres and Neptune (and what is the Popish host but bread and water?) they have contrived a consigned wafer which turns paper into money!"

But the beam-engine, which any who have seen the Cornish mine beam-engines can easily visualise, began pumping successfully, in spite of the fears roused by gossips and writers of Necklace's kidney. Huge crowds assembled, and the tower, with its tank and beam-engine, became a landmark and show-spot. From the first day water appears to have been supplied both regularly and successfully, and Newcomen's engine, intended to pump water from mines, had found a novel use. The surprising thing is that this success was not copied and exploited.

The great tower was still a draw in 1729. The Foreigner's Guide to London, published in that year, states;

"Here you see a high wooden tower and a water engine of new invention, that draws out of the Thames above three tons of water in one minute, by means of the steam arising from water boiling in the great copper, a continual fire being kept for that purpose; the steam being compressed and condensed, moves by its evaporation and strikes a counterpoise, which counterpoise striking another moves up a great beam, which by its motion of going up and down draws the water from the river, which mounts by great iron pipes to the tower. This machine though it be not so large as that of Marley, in France, yet considering its smallness and the little charge it was built and is kept with, and the quantity of water it draws, its use and benefit is much beyond that."

The scheme came to an end in 1731, after working successfully for almost six years. It was still unusual enough as a show-piece for comment ten years later, and in All Alive and Merry, or the London Daily Post of April 18, 1741, the following account appears:—

"There is a famous machine in York Buildings, which was erected to force water by means of fire, thro' pipes laid for the purpose in several parts of the town, and it was carry'd on for some time to effect, but the charge of working it, and some other reasons concurring, the York Buildings Company lay aside the design, and no doubt but the inhabitants are very glad of it, for its working which was by sea-coal, was attended with so much smoak, that it not only must pollute the air thereabouts, but spoil the furniture."

London air must both have been clear and been held precious then.

The wooden pipes used for carrying the water-supply were dug up during excavations in Brook Street, Grosvenor Square, about the years 1847-48. At first they caused some discussion, but the old tower and pumping-engine were recalled, and the origin of the pipes established. Newcomen's engine was before its time, but it was adopted for tin-mine pumping throughout Cornwall and remained in use in its more modern form in one of the last two tin mines of any size operating in Cornwall until the present day.

The sight of this tower on London's water-side sky-line in 1725 would be striking, for the Cornish engine-houses, even in a semi-ruinous state, give the Cornish landscape of to-day a striking sky-line. The heavy heart-beat of the rising and falling beam of Newcomen's engine would be a novel sound for Londoners, too. And the wash-basins with their taps would have their curious knots of visitors in each fortunate house, and the Lancashire wizard who stoked the sea-coal, the locksmith who came to stare on 18th-century London and to see his engine working, with the Welshmen from Penmaenmawr would be sights for the Londoners, too.

The "bubble" years were changing London's fortunes. "In the course of a few days a multitude of individuals were raised from indigence to a profusion of wealth" comments a writer. The "upstart gentlemen" drove into the park among the carriages of the old aristocracy, and an old record gives these significant figures: 200 new coaches and carriages had appeared on London streets; 4,000 embroidered coats; 3,000 gold watches, and "some few private acts of charity and about two thousand broken tradesmen."

The shareholders in the York Buildings Company could count themselves lucky in their successful venture, and London benefited through visitors drawn thither to look on this wonder of the age, the first London steam-engine on a large scale that worked. Before Trevithick; before Stevenson!

How the bucks would stare and the women chatter! but here was the Man of the New Era—the machine-age leered for a moment in the reign of the first Hanoverian King of England with the Stuarts thrust out, and the desperate foray of the '45 to come. Did Johnson turn aside to gaze on this marvel? The tower was still standing when he settled in London. Only the journalists seized on the portent: the great men of the age, writers, politicians, philosophers are silent. A passing marvel! None saw in this experiment a forecast of the new force that would link London with every corner of Britain, replace the coaches and create a new order of Society.

A wonder for sightseers—only Necklace hinted at smoke and fog, and poisoned air, and even he ended with a popular Anti-Popery quip, coming down on the popular side of his day. People came for ten years or so to see the marvel, and then it vanished. How? No one bothered to make a record. The North Bank "Exhibition" of 1725 closed unsung.

TREE-CLIMBING GOATS OF MOROCCO

By COLIN WYATT

"ALL THE ARGANIER TREES WITHIN STONE'S THROW WILL HAVE THEIR UPPER BRANCHES FULL OF HUNGRY BLACK GOATS"

THE alpine activities of the chamois are well known to all, but most people are unaware of the high degree of acrobatic skill that is inherent in the humdrum goat of everyday life, only to be brought out by dire necessity.

Down in the south-west corner of Morocco, in the area around Mogador, Agadir and Taroudannt, grows a tree called the arganier, a relative of the olive, which occurs nowhere else in the world. It is a much bigger tree than the olive, rather spiny, and bears a rich crop of fruit almost exactly like large olives, only harder and of a lighter green. They are of no use for human consumption raw, but yield a very fine oil which is much used in Morocco. In the area in which they grow the ground is so arid and stony that to all intents and purposes there is no green stuff except for the thorny camel-bushes and the arganiers. So the local goats have to rely upon these for their food, and since the camel-bushes are almost too spiny even for goats they have taken to climbing the arganiers for their daily meal. They have thrived so well on it that the natives' herds have increased to a degree where serious depredations are being caused to the arganier forest, and the authorities are much perturbed as to how to preserve the trees without upsetting the native herdsman.

It is quite a common sight to see a herdsman sitting on the ground apparently alone, but all the arganier trees within stone's throw will have their upper branches full of hungry black goats, who bound about from limb to limb and out on to the most unsubstantial branches with complete nonchalance.

After a short while in this area of Morocco one soon realises that the expression "a giddy goat" is a great libel on a very sure-footed and versatile quadruped.

DOCUMENTS IN COUNTRY HOUSES

By JAMES NOWELL

THE RECEIPT SENT BY JOAN, LADY MOHUN, TO ELIZABETH LUTTRELL IN NOVEMBER, 1376, FOR 5,000 MARKS FOR THE PURCHASE OF THE CASTLE OF DUNSTER AND THE ADJACENT MANORS. In the possession of Mr. Geoffrey Luttrell

THERE survive to-day the Rolls, the judicial records, from over 13,000 mediæval manors. Their condition is not always what it might be, nor are the membranes always complete, but the fact that these records have survived the centuries from so many districts makes it clear that old documents are not the rarity that many may think they are. In the country districts, where houses endure, and where families often remain for generations, they are decidedly common; frequent enough, indeed, to deserve at least a passing knowledge in any rural householder.

Not everyone can expect to find himself the possessor of a mediæval deed, but these are not the only documents that are worth preserving, nor the only ones to count as old. Many papers and parchments, however, are come across every year by someone buying an old house, or rummaging through the drawers of an old bureau in his family home—documents that for one, two, three hundred years may have lain unknown and unexamined. How often it happens! Or how often, "a few old papers" are known to be upstairs without anyone's having the slightest idea what they are!

Only a month or two ago a reviewer in The Times Literary Supplement, commenting on Letters from America, 1773 to 1780, by Sir James Murray, remarked:

Some years ago the papers of Murray's namesake, John Murray, Earl of Dunmore and last Royal Governor of Virginia, were discovered in a London attic. James Murray's papers were found at Methven, Perthshire. Hidden away in old houses in Great Britain, Canada and the United States there must be many similar collections. They deserve to be brought to light.

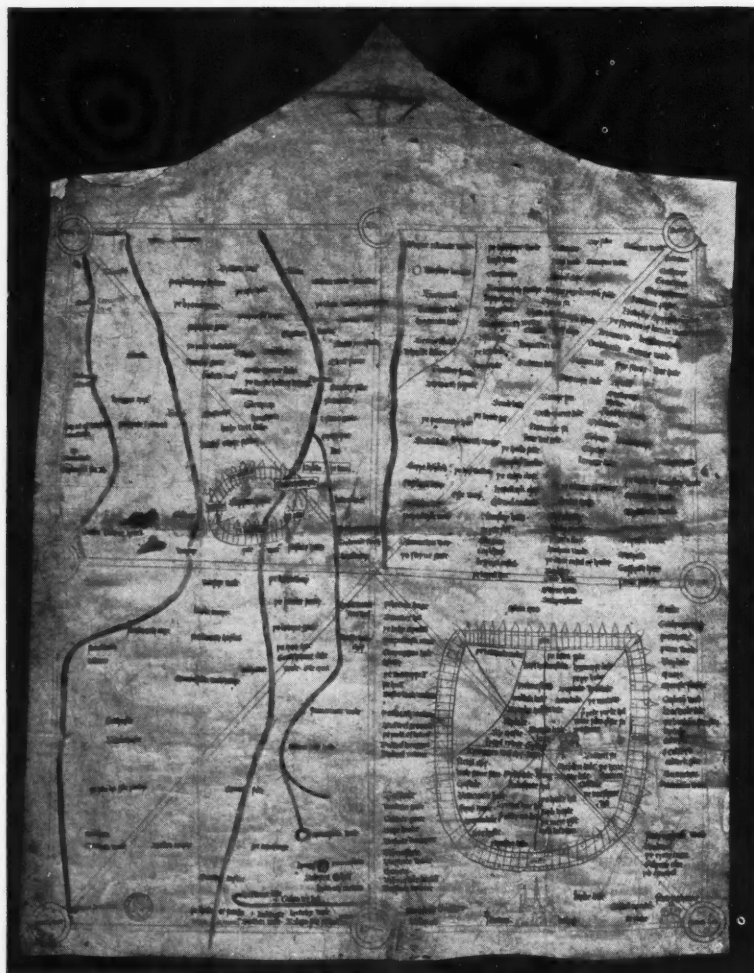

These remarks can be confirmed from the personal experience of any archivist. It is incredible what lies unknown in attics and barns, cupboards and drawers, up and down the country.

Musty bundles, roughly tossed at some time into an old box, and discovered to-day in a barn or attic or cellar, are hardly things to excite enthusiasm, or to create an impression of importance. They will probably have no monetary value; almost certainly they will appear to be a nondescript collection of papers and mention only the names of unheard-of people of the past. Yet, to anyone who finds such things, they bring a thrill. Documents written generations ago, and suddenly found, appeal to the romantic sense in people.

And, what is more, they are important; for our knowledge of the past is built on thousands and thousands of small pieces of historical evidence, and even the least find in a drawer will provide another shred to support, or help to disprove, some historical belief.

In mediæval times the principal purpose of the records that have survived was the administration of land and justice, and the writing of the Middle Ages was reduced to a minimum (even what was written was abbreviated) on account of the expense of materials and perhaps the cost of a scrivener. But as wealth increased, as materials became cheaper, as economic life and activities developed and writing became general, the documents that people needed multiplied, until to-day archives survive which embrace not only every conceivable rank of person, but almost every imaginable human activity. The documents to be found in country houses may cover anything from manorial court rolls, dealing with the judicial business of the mediæval manor, to household accounts, estate maps, letters, marriage settlements, and all kinds of bills, diaries and legal papers. Sometimes there may be account books of the parish officers and even registers which have strayed from their church in days when perhaps a local patron sometimes took them into his care.

But it is impossible to recount the innumerable possibilities. Papers may be found dealing with anything. All that can be stressed, and must be, is that nothing old is so unimportant as to warrant destruction without careful consideration, or so recent—excepting current personal papers—as to be unworthy of being considered of interest to the archivist.

It is a good measure of the public interest in archives that to-day most counties have established a County Record Office, and these offices are only too pleased to help and advise anyone about his documents. If one has any documents, some of the older ones may require specialised attention and repair; or if some are earlier than the 18th century one may be quite unable to read them; or one may have problems about storing documents. All these are matters on which County Record Offices can be consulted. Record offices are equipped for the safe storage of archives, and owners, particularly if they have an extensive collection, are encouraged to deposit their documents on loan to the one in their county, where they will be kept safely and, if necessary, repairs to them will be carried out. There is no charge for such deposit; nor, on the other hand, are any rights of ownership surrendered.

The advantages of depositing documents—safe storage, skilled attention, their availability to students without inconvenience to the owner—are plain, though one cannot but sympathise with people who prefer to keep their documents at home. This course, however, is not to be recommended unless the documents can be stored in suitable conditions, and it may help to say something about their storage.

The greatest threat to documents is dampness; the simplest preservative fresh air and a steady temperature. Documents that are found to be damp should be dried slowly by being left about in ordinary room temperature where the air can circulate, and then stored in a place free from dampness, and from condensation, where the fresh air can get at them. The best method is to keep them, not too tightly packed, in heavy cardboard boxes on open shelves of either wood or steel. The air can then circulate. They should not be stored, however, whether in boxes or not, in bundles, for every time a bundle is undone some document will certainly be damaged. And what air can enter a tight bundle?

The other alternative that generally presents itself is a chest. If archives must be kept under lock and key and the room itself cannot be locked, this is the only possibility. But it has its problems. There must be holes for the air to circulate. If it rests on a stone floor the chest should be raised on wooden blocks. An iron chest is liable to rust—the one stain that can not only never be removed but also spreads, once it appears, both in the chest and through the documents. And the wooden chest must be resistant to worm, which endanger not only the chest but the documents, too.

Nor can a wooden chest be impregnated with a deterrent, for the chemical action of such preparations will in course of time damage the documents. So the choice of wood is important. For years teak has been used for storage, but it is no longer to be obtained, certainly not cheaply, and my own preference goes to sweet chestnut, which is remarkably resistant to natural prey like worm.

Provided there is no rust, however, an iron chest is quite safe if air holes are bored in it, and it is lined with newspaper which is inspected and changed at intervals. The newspaper absorbs moisture, but to have it in the chest does mean that if rust begins the documents will not immediately be harmed.

Someone may ask: "Why are these documents being kept? How does anybody know that I have them, even if I do put them in order and store them properly?"

Such questions are understandable, for the channels of historical research are not widely known, and few people realise the extent to which the care of archives and their study have been carried. Since the 14th century the Rolls of the Courts, and State documents, have been cared for in a sporadic manner, but it was only less than a hundred years ago that their custody was really set on a proper footing. In 1869, a Historical Manuscripts Commission was appointed "to make enquiries into the places in which manuscripts and papers of general public interest belonging to Institutions or private families are deposited and, with the consent of the owners, to publish the contents of those which tend to the elucidation of History and the illustration of Constitutional Law, Science and Literature."

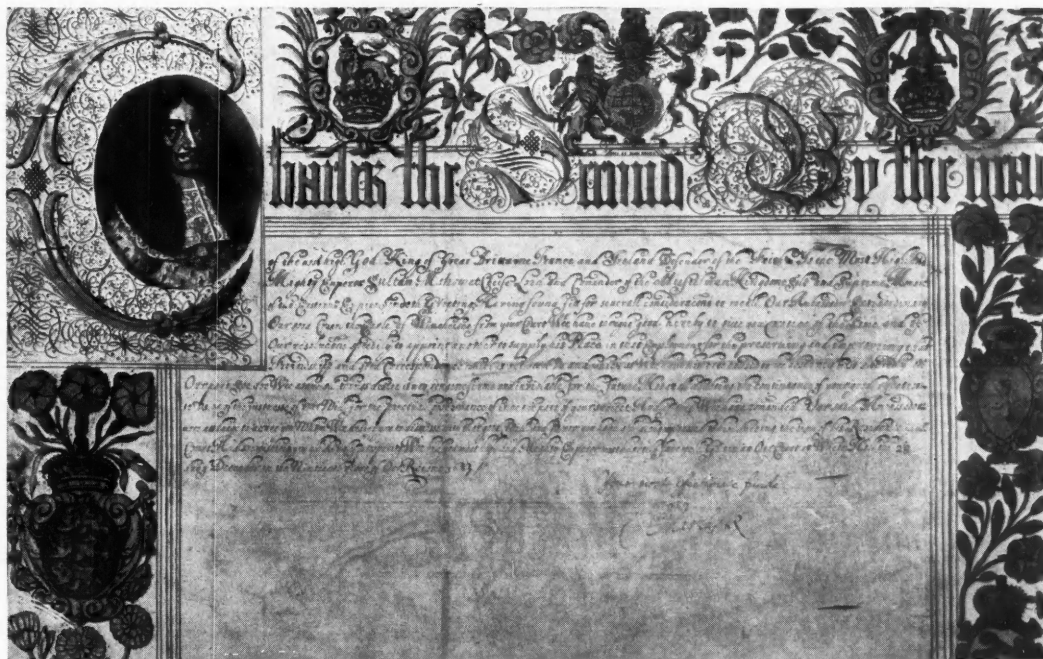

The Historical Manuscripts Commission has been in existence ever since, and has published 81 series of catalogues and abstracts of documents examined. They have, however, reported mainly on the large accumulations belonging to corporate bodies and the greater landed gentry, and have not themselves of reporting on the documents is largely done by part-time local volunteers reporting on their own districts.

Some of the fruits of the researches of the Historical Manuscripts Commission and its child, the National Register, can be seen at an exhibition to be held in the Old Hall of Lincoln's Inn for a fortnight from June 25. It has been organised by the Historical Manuscripts Commission as a part of the Festival arrangements, to show the public some of the documents and some of the varied classes of record that have survived the years. All the documents are in private hands—that is, non public bodies as well as families—and are drawn from all sorts of private owners and custodians—families, companies, Inns of Court, and many other types of holder.

The Public Records have not been drawn on, nor the parish chests of the country, nor the Church as a whole, nor the Law Courts; though in the accidents of time many papers from public sources have found their way into private hands, and several will be found on show at the exhibition.

This is not an exhibition purely for the expert; it is pre-eminently an exhibition for the public, for the people who would like to see some outstanding old documents

THE LETTER THAT WAS SENT BY CHARLES II TO THE SULTAN OF TURKEY IN DECEMBER, 1667, NOTIFYING HIM OF THE RECALL OF THE THIRD EARL OF WINCHILSEA, WHO HAD BEEN AMBASSADOR TO TURKEY SINCE 1660. In the possession of Major James Hanbury

attempted to cope with the vast mass of documents in the possession of inconspicuous owners, and in the solicitors' offices up and down the country.

For a long time, however, the need to do something about these lesser collections has been felt; and in 1943 a voluntary body, the British Records Association, made representations that the matter was urgent and that some collation of information about these unlisted documents should be begun. Then, in 1945, the Commission was authorised to undertake the compilation of a National Register of Archives, a summary index of all documents in private or corporate hands that may have, either now or in the future, historical value.

As can be imagined, the task is enormous, but when it nears completion we shall have surely the most remarkable register in the world, of enormous value to the historian. The index will include even the smallest owner of an old paper or diary; places and people that occur in documents in different districts will be revealed by the cross-indexing, so that papers hitherto thought lost will now be revealed, wherever they may be.

Accounts of a Yorkshire village may be revealed in Somerset; or Leicestershire family papers appear in Kent. And the work from the nation's homes and businesses, without feeling shamefully lost as to what they mean.

The variety is remarkable, not only of subjects but also of age. Documents on view, of which three are reproduced here, range from one dealing with the purchase of a mediæval castle to a 19th-century game book that appeared as an exhibit in the 1872 Tichborne Case; from the writings of Elizabethan Ministers to those of regimental officers airing opinions on George II, and on the Duke of Wellington; from the marriage certificate of Arabella Stuart to Dr. Arbuthnot's views on Gulliver's Travels; or maps ranging from a mediæval one of Sherwood Forest, or a 16th-century book of maps, to a modern aerial survey. All these are examples of the range of the exhibits, and of the truth that documents do not have to be old to be classed as archives—though there is a bias towards the ancient, if only because the later the documents the more frequently are they to be met in other places.

The Old Hall of Lincoln's Inn is an excellent place for such an exhibition, and in its surroundings, watched over by its portraits, one may come to see that the work of archivists, and the talk of finds in barns and country houses, is not entirely fruitless or unreal.

HOME AGAIN By RICHARD CHURCH

WITH what eagerness we went away for a month's holiday! After a wet winter, and a coincidence of professional and family anxieties, we suddenly decided to escape for a while, thus to look at our affairs, and the weather over our personal sky, from the outside. The packing of bags began with the usual excitement and discussion. "Do you really need that unmanageable hat-box?" And the riposte: "Is it really necessary to lug around quite that number of books?" All part of the mutual thrill; as it were a flapping of wings preparatory to flight.

And then the drive to Dover on a misty, moist morning through the lanes of homeland, followed by the Channel crossing with the sea kind and participant in the holiday mood. After that the familiar smell of French tobacco on the quay at Calais, and the first meal on a French train after our bags were safely stored in the sleeper which should be our camp for the next twenty-four hours. Then the journey through beloved France, where spring was still tardy. Rows of poplars touched with finger-tip pink buds; marshy tracts flesh-tinted with the cuckoo-flower; farms within their own court-streets and buildings, and a favourite restaurant. This complication of Chronus was further tangled by excursions to other places—Assisi, Perugia, Pisa—and outlying spots where friends invited us to admire their hillside gardens, retreats such as Virgil and Horace must have enjoyed two thousand years ago. Some of the gardens looked that age, especially one at Bellosguardo, overlooking Florence, though I know that it was a mere three centuries old. I shall never forget those terraces and stone balustrades, stained with moss and brushed by fronds of cypress; great Roman vases filled with azaleas and camellias, wistaria dropping down like falls of amethyst from terrace to terrace, giving on to bosquets and groves where statues glimmered in the shade and trees shaped like gigantic green candle-flames stood without flickering against the sky. And beyond all this, stretched below in a lake of dazzling sunlight, lay Florence, like an intricate cameo on the bosom of the hills, a city of topaz, emerald and gold.

Days began to form into a traffic-block, racing up, halting, and piling their experiences upon us until our minds were buried in the confusion of events and riches. When did we do in a room where the confinements of winter had coagulated. The great winds of the life and art of a vanished people came roaring through our timid casement and swept our cares away. How happy we were, among the courteous Tuscan people, who have a faculty for entertaining visitors! We stared at the handsome materials in the shop windows (long unfamiliar to English eyes), we enjoyed the inspired cooking of good food, we let the skill and beauty of the Tuscan way of life penetrate the pores of our minds as it were by a kind of osmotic pressure, as the sun comes down upon starved fields, or a drop of rose-attar works its aromatic way through a wardrobe of tired garments.

And then time played its last trick. Before we realised what was happening we were in a sleeper once more, rushing north through the day and night, but without the sense of adventure. The Channel crossing this time was less friendly. A north-easterly wind blew; the sea was made of cold but molten lead that heaved and heaved again, so that we arrived at Dover wondering if... if... But no, we were not capable of wonder. It was a matter of staggering to the car, faintly recognising something of one's yards, half mediæval fortress and half squalid slum, but wholly beautiful; villages near and far, in the plain or perched on hillsides, with their ancient churches and domains each with a manoir seemingly built of ivory; peasants fishing and ploughing: all these ancient and recognisable features of a mighty nation flashing past the windows of the carriage until darkness came down and we crept into our bunks, to listen through the night to rhythms, bumps, vague cries at vaguer stations, with an occasional shrill lamentation from the locomotive that made sleep impossible, even had we desired it. And we only half desired it, for to sleep would have been to lose something of the adventure that comes afresh every holiday.

And, as always before, time began to play its tricks. No sooner were we set out from our own door than time raced like the wheels of an old clock from which the pendulum has been removed. Routine is the pendulum, I suppose, which makes our home life and working day so steady, so slow and regular. There we were, no sooner started than arrived, nearly two days later, in Florence. And within an ace of our arrival we discovered we had been there for three days, yet might have been there for three months, so familiar were we with several this? When see that? Whom did we meet to-day? No, that was last Monday! So it went on. And, alas, the holiday went on too, a feast of encounters, scenes, contacts with grandeur and beauty that cannot be described because in our modern world we lack the unself-consciousness to do it. Who were these Renaissance citizens with their glittering princes, we asked each other, that amid anarchy, political corruption and a total lack of hygiene could stamp the face of Tuscany and Umbria with the seal of splendour and a pride that even to-day, with that seal cracked and no more than a museum relic, forces the tourist into a mood of reverent wonder? We sought the answer, and did not find it. Time would not permit many other enquiries and exultations to work out their consummation. There we were, wandering about like children in Aladdin's cave, staring up at vast halls, frescoes, carvings, appalled by the richness, the expertise, the genius and craftsmanship that adorned five centuries of a civilisation that can never be imitated and will never be surpassed.

All that in a holiday, a month in which the problems of self and our local dilemmas were cancelled out by this superb draught of impressions. It was a throwing open of windows own, and subsiding into it, grateful for a promise of home.

That was it. At that moment we realised what is, after all, the most intimate and penetrating experience during the whole of a long holiday. It is the realisation that one is home again; and it comes just before the very last moment when, the final second of time ticking out before the return to the normal sequence of the hours and weeks and months, we touch the threshold and know that we are back, and the holiday finished.

The drive home after that, through the Kentish lanes where spring still was delayed, became a mood of reminiscence gradually giving place to an eagerness far more compelling than that with which we had started out a month before. As we drew near, and nearer, noticing a tree here that was familiar, there a cottage whose owner was an old acquaintance, then finally almost the very clods of earth in the fields, we knew that here was the crown of our pleasure, after all the junketings and ecstasies; thus to be back in a quiet place, among our own things, small enough and humble enough after the splendours of Renaissance Italy and the flowers of the Mediterranean culture. Small, but our own, and no longer saturated with care.

REFLECTIONS ON THE FIRST TEST MATCH

By R. C. ROBERTSON-GLASGOW

WRITERS often praise the historic splendour of Lord's, the bosky beauty of the Parks at Oxford, and the green vista from the Mote at Maidstone. But Nottingham's Trent Bridge has a charm all its own, though most bowlers would be reluctant to admit it. On the West side, just outside the fence, stands the tree over which that eminent Victorian, George Parr, used to hit the ball with frequency and pleasure. In those days they played nearer to that boundary. Even so, it was a tidy smack.

Trent Bridge had a worthy opener; William Clarke, who was booed for charging 6d. to see his matches. It was Clarke, an astute near-under-arm bowler, who used to cruise around behind the nets when his opponents were practising, and remark in a loud voice, "there's going to be some accidents happen to these chaps very soon." On this ground, too, Arthur Shrewsbury, of Nottingham, played many a long innings, with his mastery in the back stroke. It was he who, in the days when there was no interval after lunch before close of play, used to say to the attendant as he walked out to bat, "send me out a cup of tea at four o'clock."

And now, perhaps, it might be called Compton's ground, because, in all four Tests that he has played here, he has scored a century. 102 in his first Test against Australia, 1938; 163 against South Africa, 1947; 184 against Australia, 1948; and now, 112 against South Africa. This last innings, I fancy, is the one he should treasure most, for it marks his re-emergence from Test failure. It takes courage as well as skill to come back.

The match against the South Africans started with some discomfort. One of Mr. Garndyce's east winds blew. It was the sort of day when people look around for something to criticise, and they picked on the pitch. They said that no match would ever be finished on it. Certainly the pitch at Nottingham is, in its normal state, a headache for bowlers. It has been marled to death. But bowlers are apt to make this perfection an excuse for just turning over the arm and hoping for the best.

This, perhaps, is where the Australian bowlers surpass the English. They are so used to this perfection and they think up means of overcoming it by changes of pace and flight. George Gunn, the old Nottingham and England batsman, says that the Trent Bridge pitch was always easy. "We make the marl, and, by gum, we use it." Gunn was asked if Wilfred Rhodes ever got him out on these pitches, and he answered, "He used to fiddle me out." The batsmen, for their part, tend to say, "The bowlers resort to defensive fields and bowling just short of a length, so we in our turn cannot make strokes." But there never was pitch, nor bowling, that the real stroke player could not master.

To return to the South Africans' batting in the first innings, Waite, tallish and slim, somehow recalling Yorkshire's Arthur Mitchell in look, surprised many who had seen only his defence by the power and style of his back play. The nimble E. A. B. Rowan chased a "cutter" from Brown and was caught at the wicket. We thought it rather rash and naughty at the time, but then we were thinking in terms of everlasting batting. McGlew, a beautiful outfielder, was gay enough, and unlucky to play on in a complicated and unlikely manner. So to Nourse, whom I shall call great. Nourse has nothing beautiful about his batting, unless it be his square cut. But he, too, is relentless and knows what he means to do. His even more rugged father would have approved, silently, of this innings. He was 76 not out at the end of the first day, and there was about him a strong suggestion of continuance.

On the second day he continued to 208. He had times of extreme slowness, but it should be remembered, as it was not by some barrackers, that he had a painful and injured thumb which, indeed, prevented his batting in the second innings. But it did seem that one or two of his partners might have pressed on a little faster. At the end of this day it seemed that England must set themselves to the heavy task of a draw. And Ikin had gone. Little did we know what excitements were in store; so little that many went off home promising never to see another Test.

But they all came back, with their friends and relations, on the Saturday and saw a wonderful exhibition of stroke-play by Simpson, with Hutton for once as artistic supporter instead of stay. Then Compton took Hutton's place, a Compton wary but solid. Rain interrupted for 80 minutes. After it the match entered a new phase. For the first time batting looked difficult. It was to look even more so. The 21-year-old McCarthy and the 40-year-old Chubb bowled with gusto and skill, but little luck. Indeed, Chubb's spectacles seemed to glow with disappointment. It was here that the left-handed Watson, of Yorkshire, showed the right stuff, staying with Compton through considerable trial.

Still, on the fourth morning the talk was all of a draw. Compton went to his century, and the fair-haired Watson showed unusual skill in were starting on the surely not too difficult task of scoring 186. They opened slowly but accurately, and I thought of old ladies who play a winning hand at whist in their own good time in front of a comfortable fire. Chubb and McCarthy looked to be no more than agents of the inevitable. McCarthy was watched easily from the pitch. But suddenly he bowled a very fierce ball which rose abruptly and hit Hutton in the chest. How much this blow unsettled him I cannot say. But very soon he hit a full toss straight back to A. Rowan, who took the unexpected gift with gratitude. Lunch came at 25 for one; and England's position as yet caused no anxiety.

But afterwards the pitch and events quickened. Simpson never settled, and soon he drove a ball back for A. Rowan to take another caught-and-bowled. Neither of these wickets fell through any venom in the bowling. But now the act of batting seemed to change from labour to torture. Mann, whose slow left-hand bowling had in the first innings verged on the innocuous, came on and soon looked like a combination of Blythe and J. C. White. On the hook. He looks likely to stay in the England team. But much praise is due here to McCarthy. Bowling very fast and just short of a length, he prevented England from hurrying just when hurry was needed. McCarthy's cricket is the very expression of keenness and delight, and near the end of the match, when Eric Rowan called him from near the boundary to bowl, I loved the way he ran to the wicket and tore off his sweater. Which done, he knocked back Bedser's off stump.

When Brown declared at four o'clock on that fourth afternoon, the match boiled up. From now onwards the bowlers had their fun. They had earned it. Rain had taken the smugness out of the pitch, and on it Bedser bowled as he had bowled in Melbourne against Australia. Tattersall helped him with his off-spinners, and Ikin was brilliant at close short-leg. Now there was no Dudley Nourse to stop the downward slide of the batting. At the close of the fourth day the odds were on England.

Still more so after forty minutes on the fifth morning. Bedser was again terrific, whipping the ball up from a perfect length. Van Rynveld was caught low at first slip by Hutton. The cheerful Chubb made a few bold hits. But, at twenty minutes past twelve, Hutton and Ikin these occasions it is the unenviable job of the critic to weigh in the scales the virtues of the winners and the faults of the losers. Here I must take a plunge and say that the bowling was good but not so good that it might not have been hit. E. Rowan placed four short-legs, almost a crowd, for his brother's off-spinners. Ikin was never wholly subdued. But Compton just could not get the ball away.

"O aching time! O moments big as years!" Mann yoked Ikin. Compton and Watson were l.b.w. Surely Brown might now play the hero. He hit A. Rowan for one hearty four, then was easily caught close in the leg, and a silence fell on Trent Bridge. Bailey batted with courage, as ever. But Evans was no more than an appearance and a disappearance. It was left to Yorkshire's Wardle to imitate Woolley and crack the ball around the field. A six and five fours in a score of 30 restored the stunned spectators to consciousness. Then he hit A. Rowan nearly to the clouds. Substitute McLean judged the catch exactly at long-on, then tossed the ball up in delight.

It was indeed a famous victory for South Africa, and that without their captain's batting in the second innings. But, somehow, it never should 'a' been. No; it never should.

THE YORK ASSEMBLY ROOMS RESTORED

The most outstanding work in architecture of the Earl of Burlington, the Assembly Rooms at York were built 1730-36. The completion by the York Corporation of their repair and redecoration is a permanent contribution of Festival year to the British scene.

By R. A. ALEC-SMITH

IT is good, perhaps, among the mass of transitory events that have been arranged up and down the country to remind ourselves that one of the objectives of the Festival of Britain is a permanent beautification of the British scene. In this respect the Corporation of York has set a high standard as well as an example to other public bodies by its repair and redecoration of the Assembly Rooms in Blake Street, between the Minster and the Mansion House, which became its property in 1939.

At that time the Rooms were neglected, encrusted with coarse Victoriana and in a structurally dangerous condition. The new owners, enjoying a wide measure of support among York citizens, who have so often shown themselves appreciative of the fine architectural heritage for which they are responsible, at once secured the fabric and removed the more obviously offensive encrustations. The inner rows of columns were found to be of stone, with wooden blocks inside the stressed capitals, the outer columns of brick. The chief structural undertaking involved was to tie the building together with 4 ft. x 5 ft. box girders inserted all round the hall above the colonnades and below the clerestory. The columns had in some places settled clean away from the beams bearing the clerestory (which is of timber and stucco). Further progress, however, was stopped with the outbreak of war, when the Rooms were taken over by the

THE FRONT OF THE YORK ASSEMBLY ROOMS ON BLAKE STREET

Food Office, in whose occupation they remained until recently. Their redecoration was in 1950 entrusted by the Corporation to Mr. Oliver Messel, who was subsequently, however, prevented from directing the work, and the decorations as now completed have been devised by Mr. Arthur Boys. It is fair to say, in general terms, that the interiors are surprisingly little changed since the building was erected by Lord Burlington between 1730 and 1736. Mr. Boys's schemes, and the Corporation's wishes, are admirably conservative.

In 1653 Sir Thomas Norcliffe, of Langton, acquired for the purpose a part of the site upon which the Assembly Rooms now stand and which was bought from his son by the Directors (of the Assembly Rooms) in 1726, together with the house of Francis Drake (1696-1771), the noted author of York's standard history, Eboracum. These and other adjacent plots having been obtained, a fund was opened among the county and merchant families of Yorkshire for subscriptions towards the actual construction. The Earl of Burlington (1695-1753), who was then engaged upon relaying the pavement in the Minster and designing a new Mansion House, and who had strong county connections—a property at Londesborough in the East Riding, as well as his title (the old fashioned form of Bridlington)—was asked to draw up the plans.

At first Burlington did not consider the amount already raised to be sufficient for the sort of scheme he had in mind, and offered to raise £500 from his friends if the Committee would add a further £500. This was done and after £2,000 more had been collected, bringing the grand total to £8,000, work was begun in 1729. The foundation stone, inscribed in Latin, was laid on March 1 of the following year. Though one of the small rooms was completed in 1731, it was not until five years later that the great room, or Egyptian Hall, was covered. Many of the gentry are recorded as having given blocks of marble for chimney-pieces. Stone for the constructional work was brought from the Cawood and Huddlestone quarries, and the "stone flags," presumably slates with which the great room was originally roofed, were imported through Hull.

The plan included a semicircular portico to the Blake Street elevation from which a subway led to the crypt where chairmen and servants waited for masters and mistresses. The semicircular portico was removed, and the whole building refronted, shortly after 1800, to widen the road. Its place was taken by the flat free-standing Ionic portico that remains to-day, with the pavement running through it—an even later modification that entailed altering the base.

Within the portico double doors give into the vestibule painted a stone colour, and with apsidal ends giving into retiring rooms. Immediately in front, through other double doors, is the great Egyptian Hall, 112 feet long, 40 feet broad and 40 feet high. It is completely surrounded by the colonnade, consisting of forty Corinthian columns, marbled a warm honey colour, in close spacing, which divides on all four sides the main room from its aisles, and supports, above a full entablature, the clerestory where forty-four long windows with thick glazing bars alternate with as many pilasters of the same order. The "stone flags" already mentioned gave place to pantiles many years ago and these in turn, found ruined in 1939, have been renewed with grey-green Westmorland slates. There is, however, a very attractive aspect of the clerestory from Duncombe Place. While the lower parts of the Rooms are obscured by other buildings, the high clerestory with its stucco walls, its many windows and its overhang of tiles casting a deep shadow, stands out like Italian houses in a Canaletto picture.

Before the close of the 18th century it had become usual for servants or members of the public, on payment of a penny, to go on the flat roof and watch through the windows the ballroom scene beneath. Previously, rout benches of carved wood (of which none now remains) with an escallop design and covered with red cushions fringed at the front, had been placed all round the hall just in front of the columns, where they not only spoiled the proportions of the colonnade but accentuated the narrowness of the room. Behind these, in the aisles, the servants had been allowed and there were gated gangways leading on to the floor. But the scheme, soon found unsatisfactory, was abandoned and the benches were removed. Burlington, it is worth noting, had put the benches behind the columns where they were almost out of sight, but from which no good view could be gained.

Mr. Boys has, throughout, tried to discover and replace the original colour schemes. In the case of the Egyptian Hall, and the two smaller halls north and south of it, an olive green has been used both for the wall spaces and for all the architecture, though the capitals of the main colonnade are lined with red and some of their members are gilded, a treatment that has been used as well with good effect in the entablature. In the clerestory there is no gilding, but the capitals of the pilasters and the festoons of flowers between them are touched up with white. It might have been more correct to treat these details as well as the cornice in solid white, but here a difficulty arose in that Burlington's design included the capitals as a part of the frieze, so that there is no distinct division between wall filling and architecture.

The white ceiling is plain and there is no reliable evidence that it was ever decorated, though some 18th-century engravings show varying forms of Palladian ornamentation. These are probably purely imaginative. From it are suspended eleven large glass chandeliers, copied this year by Messrs. Venini, of Venice (who believe they made the originals in 1736 which were got through a Mr. Watson, of London) from the only one that has survived—in the Treasurer's House nearby. They are, in form, similar to those brass chandeliers that we are accustomed to see in 17th-century Dutch interiors, and the originals must have represented a very early use of glass for this purpose in England.

The side walls of the aisles within the colonnade are relieved by alternating square and round headed niches above a deep dado, which, after experiments in marbling, is now painted in with the walls.

The large recess in the middle of the south wall, which now will form a supper-room, has at various times been fitted up with galleries to provide extra seating. There was a pleasant one in the late 18th century, which had a front of turned wood balusters; then a Victorian gallery with three bulging gilt lincrusta bow fronts topped with red velvet like theatre boxes. It is, perhaps, for the best that both have been removed.

To the north, and approached from the Egyptian Hall through a double screen of columns, is the lesser Assembly Room. At its western end Adamesque plaques and a large archway (now blocked up with mirrors) are innovations that must certainly have been subsequent to the death of Burlington. From this room open the Cube Room and the Rotunda.

The former, with a coved ceiling and lay-light, is fitted up as a bar, although of an appropriately elegant kind. The white Palladian woodwork and a handsome Rococo overmantel mirror are set against a background of dark red flock paper. The Rotunda was, until its redecoration, a plain round room with a domed ceiling and lantern, and four deep niches that alternate with doors and the fireplace. There was never, it seems, any elaborate scheme of stucco here, and though the cornice has a pulvinated frieze, the niches were unadorned. The new decoration, devised by Arthur Boys and executed by Paul Wyeth, consists of painted paper on a canvas backing depicting scenes of Roman York, notably the Acclamation of Constantine the Great as Emperor. William Kent, as a Roman soldier but with a scroll of plans in his hand, stands in the crowd. Constantine wears the features of Burlington. The niches, now rusticated and painted as grottoes of dripping stone, have keyblocks with the heads of Jupiter, Minerva, Venus and Apollo.

THE DOUBLE COLONNADE OF THE EGYPTIAN HALL

Facilities for catering are greatly improved. A new kitchen and offices have been built, out of sight, on the south side where their position will obviate the carriage of food—frequently an unpleasant feature of public functions—through any reception rooms except the buffet. The two rooms to right and left of the entrance vestibule, which have a great architectural value of their own in the form of apsidal ends flanked by niches, and good stone fireplaces, are to be cloak rooms. One is pink with white architecture and contains a pair of carved and painted pine cupboards from Mereworth, and the other a red wine colour with rich yellow curtains.

Already some furniture and furnishings have been provided. The Corporation is to be congratulated upon its eagerness to ensure that such things as tables and chairs, required in very large quantities for purely utilitarian purposes, should be of harmonious design. A good start has been made with mirrors and sconces to break the bareness of vast wall spaces, but here is a field for future sowing. The mere colours of the rooms are not in themselves enough, and good 18th-century pictures are badly needed in the lesser Assembly Room, the Cube Room and the retiring rooms. It is to be hoped that all these fine interiors may come to be regarded as a suitable repository for works of art, whether furniture or pictures. It is surely better that lovely things, created in their day for use in, or ornamentation of, "live" buildings should find their setting again among rooms busy with civic and social purpose than that they should, in a museum, appear to the public much more as archaic relics than as objects of ageless beauty.

The Rooms have been in use during the York Festival for the reception of visitors to the city. A costume ball was held here on June 15 at which a minuet was danced by descendants of many of the original subscribers. If Lord Burlington might have been surprised at some of the costumes, he would, we may be sure, delight that an ever-growing public is appreciating again the glorious buildings that his taste bequeathed to England.

THE CUBE ROOM

PRIMITIVE ART FROM THE COLONIES

By DENYS SUTTON

ONE of the most stimulating artistic ventures associated with the Festival of Britain is the exhibition of primitive art at the Imperial Institute. This consists of art from the Colonies, which have been taken to mean those primitive societies, stretching from the Pacific islands to Africa, which are politically connected with this country. The emphasis has naturally fallen on sculpture, which is the major form of primitive artistic expression; paint is generally used only to give colour to the human features in masks.

The major portion of the exhibition is devoted to African art. On the whole, the selection seems admirable, though the scope of the exhibition and its restriction to those lands associated with Britain have provided only a partial view of the artistic achievement of the African world. This is to be regretted, and an exhibition conceived along the lines of that held at the Museum of Modern Art in New York in 1935 would have provided a welcome opportunity to present recent discoveries on an international basis.

Fifty years ago it was tempting to think of African sculpture in the most general terms. Since then, however, it seems as if connoisseurship has made a marked advance. African sculpture, like that of any other part of the world, is now seen to have its masters and specific periods. Its division into schools and tendencies, corresponding to racial and geographic conditions, has even been attempted. Charles Ratton, for instance, has pointed out that African sculpture falls into three main groups; the Sudan Group, comprising French and Portuguese Guinea, French Sudan and part of Nigeria, extending to Oubanghi; the Benin Yoruba group, whose influence runs along the west coast of Seirra Leone to Yoounde; and the Equatorial or Bantu group, which starts in the Cameroons and embraces the two Congos and Angola. Although recent discoveries have modified Ratton's division in contrasts as the predominantly geometric character of the first group, the naturalism of the second, and the synthetic nature of the third.

Nigerian sculpture—the second group—appears to particular advantage on this occasion. The selection includes three highly important pieces from the prehistoric culture of Nok, provisionally dated on geometric evidence as being from the latter half of the first millennium B.C.; these works have come to light only during recent years. Starkly expressive, they possess that naturalism characteristic of Nigerian art in general. Naturalism, although without a marked expressionistic tinge, is also the feature of the group of heads, dug up in 1938 and 1939 near the Palace of Oni of Ife, which is the centre of the religious life of Yorubaland. They are certainly earlier than the 13th century, though the dating of Negro sculpture is still extremely problematic. They are remarkable objects, with a sensitivity of portraiture unusual in Negro art, and bear a fascinating relationship to Greek, Roman and Egyptian busts. It would seem as if they reflect the operation of some external influence, though how this worked has not yet been established. These heads indicate, in any case, that Ife was the centre of a vivid naturalistic school of bronze and terra-cotta sculpture.

It would appear that the Yoruba school's use of bronze exerted a certain influence on Benin art. This sculpture was the artistic expression of the Beni tribe, an aggressive group who carved out a mighty empire in the heart of Africa during the Middle Ages. One section of their output was evidently connected with the animalistic and mystical cults associated with the Yoruba; but the other was associated with the court of Oba, and related to ancestor worship. Its range was clearly considerable, and the emphasis was placed on naturalism; it includes elegant female heads, bronze plaques, and a notable leopard in ivory with copper studs, that suggests a relationship, surely no more than fortuitous, with acquamanile; both have the same sturdiness of stance. Benin art subsequently underwent a decline; yet, even in the 16th century, such exquisite objects as the ivory pendant mask in the collection of Mrs. B. Z. Seligman could still be produced.

The central tradition of Benin art seems to have held an important place in Nigerian production; many pieces in the exhibition, although derived from other tribes and localities, suggest affinities with its main characteristics. Besides this predominantly naturalistic work, several objects on view are tinged with a greater degree of abstraction. One of the most striking objects of this nature is the wood mask of a buffalo, from the Okuni tribe, which was one of the so-called pagan tribes to the south of the central plateau of northern Nigeria; this was used in dances to promote fertility or well-being. It is this type of African art which has exerted the principal influence on contemporary European or American art.

Pacific art is also on view, and the exhibition permits a closer examination of a style with a greater range of treatment and expression than might have been thought. It is fascinating, for instance, to see the contrast between the highly decorative art of the Solomon Islands, where black wood and mother-of-pearl are combined in elegant shapes, and the human head in wood from the New Hebrides. This deeply felt sculpture seems to portray a man who is intensely human and aware of his fate. This sculpture raises one of the problems that must always be faced when one deals with a culture of which the ideas are dissimilar from one's own—namely, the difference between the artist's intention, in his own terms, and that of our interpretation of the result in our terms. Such questions emphasise the need for a study of the primitive arts in which collaboration is achieved between the anthropologist and the aesthetician.

A case in point is the deeper understanding of Negro art provided by Father Placide Tempel's recent investigation of Bantu thought (La Philosophie Bantoue, 1945), in which the nature of the Bantu world is most convincingly explained as a dynamic one, as opposed to the more static Christian world. It would be to go too far to attempt to summarise Father Tempel's arguments and deductions, yet some African concepts, such as that the world consists of a series of forces which can be increased or diminished, or that life results from their constant interaction, are clearly important for the study of African sculpture. African culture—its ancestral sculptures, its masks, its magical objects—may be seen as part of this complex of forces. But to consider African art as entirely utilitarian, as has sometimes been done, is too simple: A. C. Haddon was surely correct when, as early as 1893, he pointed out that "the artistic feeling has endeavoured to cast a glamour over the crude efforts of religion and science."

Since then the awareness of African art has increased. In the 1900s, for instance, it had a decisive effect on the work of Picasso, Vlaminck and Modigliani, and the contact with the Pacific from the '90s onwards was important for Gauguin, and other artists in Germany and America. Yet the difference in approach between the artists of Primitive and Western cultures must not be overlooked; as Mr. Fagg points out in the introduction to the catalogue, while modern art was more or less the outcome of a revolt against conventional society, Negro art is the "most perfect expression of the accepted values of tribal society." Such distinctions are valid, as is also the realisation that what seems bizarre to us is natural to the African artist, given his scale of values.

The processes of Negro art are instructive, moreover, when we are faced with the sculpture of Henry Moore, whose use of metaphor and the fusion in his work of aspects of the human and natural world are akin to those of the African sculptor; and a comparison between Moore's art and that of African or Aztec sculpture shows how much he has profited from their example.

It is understandable that the influence of African art should be potent. Its fascinations are great, with its unexpectedness of vision, its vigour, its manipulations of forms for their own sake, and its revelation of the forces in the natural and human world that are largely unknown to the European. Its limitations are equally apparent; humanism is present, but primitive art has never achieved the human depth or the serenity of a civilised society.

STRAWBERRY TIME

By ARTHUR C. HARTLEY

PERCHED on a rich rolling belt of strawberry land overlooking the Weald there is an inn known as the Pepper Pot. In late spring and summer it fills with pickers and with that race of enthusiasts, "strawberry men." The pickers come from far and near; gypsies who move in for the season, Cockneys from South London, families from the neighbouring villages and, sometimes, students from abroad; Finns, Germans and Frenchmen who are spending working holidays in camps run by the Agricultural Executive Committee. Through the haze of tobacco smoke and over mugs of beer, the talk is of strawberries, that enticing, delectable and most capricious of English fruits.

The strawberry season starts in May when the fields are strawed. There is no urgency then. Work is unhurried and moves easily. Not so in June, when the fruit ripens and if not picked at once soon rots on the stalk. Then there is not an hour to be wasted. The season is short, six or seven weeks perhaps and a single fruit farm may recruit hundreds of pickers, mostly women, for the work. They roll up in lorries early in the morning, all singing, bright scarves on their heads, lunch in paper-bags. They are full of vitality, of enjoyment in the work, and throughout the day they joke mercilessly at the expense of the luckless foreman. In the evening they crowd to the Pepper Pot. "Give me 'Uxleys," says a swarthy gypsy matron. "They picks clean and they weighs 'eavy." Yes, the Huxley is a popular variety with the pickers; plenty of fruit to the plant and a heavy core that means fewer berries to the chip. For the pickers are paid by weight. The gypsy matron is the queen of the pickers. She can pick and grade 200 lb. a day and knows what she is talking about. But Huxleys are going out of fashion, and a pale young Frenchman wrestling unhappily with his tankard of English ale disagrees. "But, madam, you not find ze Climax good to eat? And ze parfum, she is beautiful." He kisses his fingers. Oddly enough no one will snigger. There is something about the aroma of freshly picked strawberries that calls up a picture dear to the heart of every country dweller; rich soil warming under a June sun, blue sky with fleeting white clouds; the perfection of a summer's day.

But in the Pepper Pot there may be also a knot of those sober experts, the strawberry men; big farmers with several hundred acres, smaller growers and perhaps a few keen amateurs. To eavesdrop on them is to hear a story of unrelieved gloom. "Reckon I've two acres down with virus," says one. "Must have lost a ton an acre with grey mould," adds another. Not to be outdone a third prosperous-looking pessimist enumerates his casualties from verticillium wilt. And so the tale of diaster mounts. It is with something of surprise that one glances out of the window of the old inn and sees the fields roll away to the horizon tufted with glossy green plants edged with a frill of bright crimson fruit.

The picture is never quite as black as it is painted, but there is no doubt that the strawberry is a capricious mistress and perhaps this is the reason for the fanatical loyalty it inspires among its devotees. The confirmed strawberry man will risk all the troubles it brings rather than switch his interest to other and less exciting rivals. Then too, for the successful commercial grower there is no doubt that strawberries pay. Fortunes were made during the war years. Those days have gone and growers on unfavourable land have lost money. But well-grown strawberries will always command a market. If you doubt this ask any Covent Garden salesman which is the most popular English soft fruit.

The problem that confronts everyone interested in strawberries is not only how to grow them successfully, but also how to prolong their brief season without the tireless and expensive business of forcing in a greenhouse.

On my own farm I have a dozen or more varieties. Some of them are purely experimental, such as the new French perpetual fruiting variety—which, incidentally, had a terrible time in the wet winter. It is said to fruit throughout the summer, a feat which leaves the plant limp and exhausted in the autumn. We shall see. I have, too, the traditional varieties; Royal Sovereign, the finest flavoured of them all, Huxleys and the new Auchincruive Climax introduced from Scotland in 1947. The Climax, a fine-tasting strawberry, has still to prove itself; there are signs that it may be more susceptible to virus than was at first thought likely. It is, however, the new Cambridge varieties that are the most exciting, for it is from some of these, grown under cloches and Dutch lights, that we are producing fruit as early as April.

The story of these Cambridge seedlings began many years ago at the Horticultural Research Station in Cambridge. Plants were imported from all over the world and from them new and promising seedlings were bred. Some fruited very much earlier than the standard varieties and responded well to protection by troublesome, for the lights must be removed for watering whereas with cloches watering can be done over the tops and the moisture will seep down to the roots.

The system of cultivation under cloches is fundamentally the same as for ordinary garden or field strawberries. The fact that the plants are covered for part of the season does, however, emphasise some of its basic requirements. The land must be in good heart and contain plenty of organic matter; it must be able to hold moisture during the early spring. Runners should be planted early. I try to get mine in by mid-August. This gives them time to make a good rooting system before winter and they can get away at a gallop when they start to grow again in the spring. Most commercial growers use fresh runners each year, but second-year plants give quite good crops under cloches and on a small scale it is often worth while cloching them for another year. The fruit will not be quite so early and the plants will take up more room and will need

Watering is apt to be a difficult problem, but generally speaking the fruit likes a moist atmosphere when it is swelling, but not afterwards. So, if it is at all dry give the cloches a regular spraying after the fruit has formed, but stop as soon as it begins to ripen.

There is still a good deal of difference of opinion as to when the plant should be cloched. Some growers do it in December, others as late as March. The answer probably lies somewhere between the two dates. I cover my plants about mid-February and have not found any advantage in doing so earlier. Covering them later than this might, I think, delay fruiting.

You may wonder whether anything has been done to encourage the plants to fruit later in the season. Here, too, some progress has been made. One or two of the recent varieties come a little after the usual time. Cambridge 503 is the one I use and it is a fine strawberry. More significant still, there are at least two varieties capable of throwing a second crop in the autumn. One of these is Climax and the other cloches. Here then was something. Early fruiting had been achieved without the trouble and expense of forcing. Cloches and Dutch lights give protection only; they do not force the plant in any way.

I have tried several of them since they came on the market three or four years ago. They are, by the way, unromantically known by numbers, a sign that they are barely out of the experimental stage. Of the very early ones I have found Nos. 257, 448 and 679 the best. But I should add a warning that the fruit of 257 is soft and delicate and will not stand much handling. No. 448, I find, needs plenty of room; it is rather a bushy plant. No. 54 is also a good early strawberry but seems susceptible to virus. Nos. 173 and 422 fruit a few days later, but I like their flavour more and have found them better suited to cloche work.

And now for a word about cloches. I myself use Growers Barns, but some prefer the flat-topped type. I doubt if there is really much to choose between them. Under Dutch lights the fruit is earlier, but cultivation is more thinning in the autumn. But if the land is limey and there is any danger of the plants, going down with lime-induced chlorosis, it is essential to use fresh runners each year, as maiden plants are seldom if ever affected by this deficiency disease.

The strawberry aphid is, of course, just as harmful under cloche as in the open and it can spread much more rapidly. So runners should be dipped in nicotine before they are planted and in spring they should be sprayed with H.E.T.P. Mildew is a troublesome disease which can spread very quickly under cloches. It is advisable, therefore, to give the plants a precautionary dusting with green sulphur after the blossom has appeared.

Strawing under cloches should not be necessary and is not recommended, as it prevents the soil heating up and delays fruiting. Where the soil is very wet—there may be plenty of cases this year—it may be advisable to straw against an attack of grey mould. For this purpose the prefabricated straw mats are useful and are quite suitable for small areas.

Cambridge 679. In a long hot summer, such as that of 1949, these will ripen in the open, but in a normal year they should be cloched just after the second crop of fruit has formed.

As I have tried to demonstrate, the cultivation of strawberries is exercising the ingenuity of enthusiastic growers and of scientists in our horticultural research stations. They have accomplished much, but there is still something sadly wanting in English strawberry lore. Is there a sonnet or a really graceful poetic tribute to this Queen of Fruit? If there is I have failed to find it. Strawberries have been growing in our English gardens since the 15th century. Of the millions who must have picked them and thrilled to their aromatic perfume and delicate flavour how many have repaid this pleasure with a line of praise? It is no excuse to plead that one can't be lyrical about a Cambridge 257. After all, it is one of the fragaria, and what name can be more lovely than that? Won't somebody write a sonnet to the strawberry?

SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY

A Golf Commentary by BERNARD DARWIN

I WENT the other day on a pious pilgrimage of the most agreeable kind,

Some vast amount of years ago

Ere all my youth had vanished from me.

I had been used to go to the home of the Richmond Golf Club at Sudbrook Park to play in the competition for the Don Memorial Cup. In really prehistoric ages I had even won it with a gutty ball, and I had won it again, according to a board in the club-house, in 1922. Shameful to say I had never been there since, but, knowing that the Don Cup was being played for one day in June, I purged my offence as far as possible by revisiting it, and positively revelling in the charms of Sudbrook and my own sentimental memories.

Sudbrook is a wonderfully pretty, peaceful spot with the noblest of trees, which get in the way if you do not drive straight enough. The "atmospherics," if I may so term them, of golf clubs vary enormously, and Sudbrook seems to me to have an atmosphere, at once staid and old-fashioned and friendly, exactly appropriate to the beautiful old house which is its club-house. In that respect it appeared perfectly and delightfully unchanged. I had heard stories of many changes of the course itself, but found them much exaggerated. The tees have, indeed, gone back, sometimes a long way, and there are certain changes, a new first hole, running parallel with the old one, and a new home hole, for instance, but the general pattern is much what it always was. As the kind secretary conveyed me in his car with extraordinary skill, dodging this way and that over the lumps and bumps, I recognised many old friends among the holes, and also among the hazards, such as the engaging little pond by the green of the short eighth, and the stately limes that stand as sentinels or goal-posts—you may choose at will the more poetical or prosaic simile—guarding the 17th green.

I nearly shed a maudlin tear over the disappearance of the old first hole with its blind second over a grassy hill between trees; a quite unjustified tear I admit, since the new hole is clearly a better one, but I had loved the old first tee-shot for a purely personal reason. It was from this tee that in the summer of 1902 I first hit a rubber-cored ball. After prodigious efforts, for there was a famine of Haskells, I had got a box, and I took them down to Sudbrook with me one evening. Reckless of the rough and trees, where my so precious ball might be lost, I instantly let fly, and the ball sailed away "with supreme dominion," and with an ecstatic sensation not to be described. It may be a great pity that the ball was ever invented; I often incline to think it is, but the first rapture of hitting it after the stonier gutty is unforgettable, and I first experienced it at that tee-shot at Sudbrook.

I don't think anybody could shed many tears over the old home hole, which was neither one thing nor the other, a kind of one-shot hole, where, as I remember it, it was hardly possible to go for the pin, having a green of unattractively steep slopes. Yet for one reason I should have liked to see it again; because I wanted to look once more on the scene of a great finish between Willie Park and J. H. Taylor. Park had been four up at Musselburgh. All day long at Sudbrook, J. H. had harried him, but Park had just kept away by means of marvellous putting and he was dormy one. He had his famous henchman "Fiery" carrying for him and here is J. H.'s account of the finish from his autobiography: "I am happy to remember that I kept Willie on the rack till the last moment, for he was left with a difficult and slippery putt of two yards on the seventy-second hole for a half, to win the match. He consulted Fiery as to the line, who laconically counselled, 'Bolt it.' Bolted it was; down went the putt, and I should like to have gazed reverentially at the place. I could doubtless have seen the tree at the 17th from which Park's second had miraculously bounded back on to the fairway to allow him undeservedly to halve the hole. If J. H. had been there I am sure he could have shown me, with a certain still rising bitterness, the very spot on its trunk.

Among several old friends among the holes, I was delighted to find the fourth exactly as it had been; an admirable, and with card and pencil, a really frightening one-shot hole, with cross bunker in front and trees on either side; emphatically a hole to leave behind one with a sigh of relief, exceedingly content with nothing worse than a four. There is, by the way, one new short hole, the 14th, which, looked at from the green, seems guileless and innocent to a degree (it is only 140 yards long) and yet, as I was told, bamboozles everybody. When I looked at it from the other end I thought I could see why. The hole has one of the difficult qualities of some St. Andrews holes; the player cannot quite see the bottom of the pin. Nobody could reproach it with being blind, but that touch of semi-blindness makes all the difference in the world. And apropos of these one-shot holes, there are six of them at Sudbrook, three in each nine holes, and all of them come at the even numbers. There is, therefore, this local rule: "In foursome play, in order to avoid the same partner playing the tee shot at all the short holes, one partner shall drive at the 8th and 9th holes consecutively, if the match starts at the first tee, and at the 17th and 18th holes consecutively if the match starts at the 10th tee." I have often heard of such an arrangement being generally made, but never before have I seen it set down as a cast-iron rule. It is a capital plan, for the responsibility of the whole six tee-shots would be altogether too heavy. There is one change not yet quite complete, namely, at the 17th, where there is to be a tee-shot out of a piece of woodland, which will make the hole a considerable "dog-leg." In any case, this is one of the holes that have grown much longer and sterner from the putting back of the tee. It is already 465 yards in length, which means a really long and difficult second for the best of men. This new tee-shot skirting the woods will add a touch of picturesque terror.

Sudbrook must, I think, be one of the earliest clubs to have made its course on the pattern of a figure of eight, having the ninth hole close to the club-house. That is almost a commonplace of golf architecture nowadays, but the Richmond Club was founded in 1893, and in those days people who had not discovered the plan of two starting places, to say nothing of the benefit of what Mr. Dick Swiveller called "a modest quencher" at half-time. The course is only 6,040 yards long even to-day, and I suppose that is deemed short. Naturally, those six one-shot holes make a difference, but the course as a whole did not strike me as short. I thought it just the right length for a pleasant, friendly match on a summer's day, and there is no doubt at all about one thing, you must mind your eye among the trees, for whatever happens to the poor old stymie, you will not be able to lift an obstructing tree. It was the greatest fun in the world to be there again.

A PROBLEM FOR THE LANDLORD

By W. J. WESTON, Barrister-at-Law

NO one now counsels "Put your savings into house property," for, by the continued pegging of most private house rents at the obsolete level of 1939, ownership of a house calling for expensive repairs is a liability, not an asset. The Rent Restriction Acts have, indeed, posed a hard problem—many a hard problem—to the landlord. And the solution of some of these problems emerges as a sequel to costly and wholly unexpected experience. R. M. R. Housing Society, Limited, v. Combs, decided by the Court of Appeal at the close of 1950, is a striking instance.

Here was a landlord intent only upon protecting the houses owned for workmen employed by affiliated companies. The plaintiff, one of the affiliated companies carrying on activities on the Rothschild Estate at Tring, Hertfordshire, let a house to a workman employed by the R.M.R. Engineering, another of the affiliated companies. The tenancy agreement contained the stipulation, "It shall be an obligation of the tenancy on the part of the tenant that he shall be and remain so employed." The workman left the employment, and the landlord sought an order for possession under the stipulation.

The method of protection adopted by the landlord might seem infallible, for the Acts enable the Court to give an order for possession when "any other obligation of the tenancy" is unfulfilled. The County Court Judge thought it to be so; and he gave the order. Up to a point the Appeal Court agreed. Then, as often, came a "but yet"; and we all know what poor Cleopatra said about "but yet";

*I do not like "But yet," it does allay
The good precedence. Fie upon "But yet"!
"But yet" is as a gaoler to bring forth

True, said the Court of Appeal, the stipulation by the tenant to give up the house if he left the employment in R.M.R. Engineering was an obligation of the tenant. It was an obligation he had willingly accepted. But it was not an "obligation of the tenancy"; and to call it so did not make it one, any more than to call a boy John Milton made him a poet. A tenant may place himself under all sorts of obligations; he may, indeed, do so in order to get a house. But, unless the obligations relate to the subject-matter of the tenancy, unless they concern the tenant as tenant and not as an individual, they are not obligations of the tenancy.

That the tenant has broken his contract—a contract entered into with his eyes open and willingly, even gladly—is nothing when Parliament has spoken. And Parliament has declared that a contract inconsistent with the protection of a tenant should not be made. "Parties to a tenancy," said the Master of the Rolls, "cannot so contract that, although the conditions are present which Parliament has declared cause the Acts to apply to the premises, nevertheless, those Acts shall not apply." One deplorable but inevitable result of the steadily growing number of statutes where "contracting out" is, either expressly or by implication, forbidden is the undermining of traditional business methods. A man may make a contract in the knowledge that it cannot be enforced against him.

The decision would have been other if R.M.R. Housing had itself been the employer. For the Acts do provide for the case of a landlord who lets to his workman a dwelling-house in consequence of his employment. If the tenant ceases to be employed by the landlord, the landlord, by showing that the house is required for another of his workmen, can get the requisite order for possession. But R.M.R. Engineering was the employer, an affiliated company, it is true, but not the same company. English law insists upon the separate entities of corporations: even though two companies have the same board of directors and the same body of shareholders, they are different legal entities. Each has its own rights, each its own liabilities. The decision would probably have been other, too, if R.M.R. Housing had let the house as agent for R.M.R. Engineering.

CORRESPONDENCE

HOOKING A WAGTAIL

SIR,—Recently, when I was fishing the mayfly on the River Ribble, Lancashire, a pied wagtail flew from the shingle bank and lifted my fly off the water and carried it about five feet into the air before it dropped it. I have twice caught bats when I have been fishing in the dusk, but never a bird before. As I dress my own flies I took it as rather a compliment.—G. MARSHALL, Sawley, Lancashire.

STICKS FOR THIRSTY PEDESTRIANS

SIR,—I have just found and bought in a pub here a malacca cane. On unscrewing the top, one foot long, I found a two-foot glass tube inside the stick. The glass in the tube is speckled.

I imagine the stick is old, but what did the smugglers or whoever they were keep in the tube?—OSCAR PRENTICE, Langstone, Havant, Hampshire.

[Walking sticks of this ingenious design were made for thirsty men. A well-known London firm of walking-stick manufacturers inform us that they were making them as recently as thirty years ago.—ED.]

HAZARDS OF TRAM TRAVEL

SIR,—In your issue of May 25 you published a photograph of the Portrush-Giant's Causeway Tramway in about 1924. I knew this tramway in the 1890s, when it was operated from a live rail about 18 inches high, running exposed along the roadside. The current was then picked up by a brush, resembling a coach spring, which ran on the top of the rail and connected it to the motor.

As the Causeway belonged to cousins of mine I recall many good stories connected with this somewhat crude and dangerous transport system. Many a broken basket of eggs and shocks to nervous systems were reported by old farm women who sat on the live rail on their way to market. The most outstanding case was when the local pack ran over the rail and one or two of the hounds went rigid on the rail in attempting to clear it, and the whips, in pulling them off by their sterna, found them like red hot poker.

Naturally, such experiences soon put the inhabitants wise to the possibilities of this exposed rail, and the tramway progressed until overhead systems were introduced.—C. de W. CROOKSHANK (Col.), Johnstownburn, Humber, East Lothian.

UNREWARDED SEARCH

SIR,—The account of a secret hiding place's being found in a bureau and the only reward's being dust (June 1), reminds me of an incident some years ago. I had bought at a sale by auction a fine rosewood tea-caddy, and when a friend called he noticed it and made an examination, remarking, "Do you know this caddy has a secret drawer?" I was then shown where it was.

The right-hand side of the caddy was made so that it would slide upwards to reveal a shallow tray at the bottom, which could be drawn out. My friend did this, and expressed disappointment at his "unrewarded search" for, as he said, "the last time I saw a caddy like this I found ten spade ace guineas, each one wrapped in tissue paper."—T. G. SCOTT, 19, Granville Road, Fallowfield, Manchester, 14.

BIRDS FIGHTING AT A FEEDING-POST

SIR,—When I first used an electronic flash outfit at my bird-table, I fully expected to secure without difficulty a series of photographs of the scenes I had often witnessed with interest and amusement from my sitting-room window. Birds flying, fighting, posturing, displaying, squabbling would all, I imagined, be easy subjects with the new apparatus.

From the first I obtained satisfactory pictures so long as I concentrated on one bird in flight, but when I tried two or more I found the difficulties increased out of all proportion, and my failures became all too frequent. However, I occasionally obtained some interesting photographs, two of which I enclose.—M. S. WOOD, Orrest Foot, Windermere, Westmorland.

OUR TREE-STARVED LANDSCAPES

SIR,—May I suggest that the main argument of your leading article entitled Our Tree-starved Landscapes (June 8) is misconceived? Would not COUNTRY LIFE be among the keenest opponents of any similar argument applied to architecture?

You exalt the 18th-century landscape and suggest that it should be preserved and regenerated in the middle of the 20th century. The 18th-century landscape was the outcome of various influences, several of which no longer exist. For example: the Navy does not now want unlimited numbers of short, spreading oaks such as were (and are, alas) grown in hedgerows; the position of great landowners is now different and far less secure; fewer people are now able and content to devote their lives to field sports; barbed wire and softwoods are preferred (doubtless sometimes wrongly) to oak, ash and elm for fencing and estate building repairs; much agriculture is now mechanised. To ignore these developments and to ask for the preservation or regeneration of the 18th-century landscape, and in particular hedgerow trees, is on a par with building Jacobethan cottages or having Tudor Tavern cars on the railways.

Surely the landscape as a whole should be allowed or encouraged to develop in accordance with the practical and changing needs of our times, and only a few special museum pieces of the 18th-century's essays in romantic naturalism should be preserved—as examples of a bygone art, beautiful, but as dead and unsuitable to our time as Tudor hovels, Restoration chairs and Regency costumes. I would go further and ask whether 18th-century landscapes re-created to-day would not be fakes and shams, as unbecoming as "Ye Olde Tea Shoppes".

This is not to argue for a tree-starved England. We want more trees, but we want them grouped in forests and woods and shelterbelts, to meet the needs of to-day and tomorrow, and not to reflect a past that is dead and gone. And we want our fields to be rather larger and more cleanly hedged, to suit modern agriculture. I suggest that the resulting field-and-forest effect will be quite as satisfying to the eye as the blotchiness of much 18th-century landscape, and in support of this argument I enclose a photograph taken recently: here the left side shows a mainly field-and-forest effect and the right side mainly an 18th-century effect.

In many parts of England the much-admired hedgerow trees have an appalling influence on our landscape. For example, looking north from the Ridgeway on the North Downs towards the Cotswolds and Oxford one sees the plain so darkened that the effect in summer is that of a false or pseudo-forest, with most of the disadvantages and none of the advantages of true forest scenery. People become accustomed to hedgerow trees in childhood, and hear them described as beautiful, so that a fixation about such trees arises in them. Detached, unprejudiced consideration of the subject becomes impossible, or very difficult.—J. D. U. WARD, Rodhuish, Watchet, Somerset.

[Mr. Ward's letter raises a fundamental question in the appreciation of scenery: whether the functional suffices to afford aesthetic pleasure. In wholly rural landscape of pleasing contour (as in the photograph) where hedgerows survive from the enclosure period, the effect is found to be agreeable, since Impressionist painting has taught us to appreciate patchwork. But a more typical illustration of landscape "allowed to develop in accordance with the practical and changing needs of our time" would include such representative and unassimilated recent contributions to the scene as raw new houses, a factory or two, poultry runs, asbestos-roofed farm buildings, wire fences and an arterial road. Must the countryside of the future have only the haphazard character of an allotment because we live in flats? Artists can discover, and reveal, new aspects of beauty in most things: witness Paul Nash's pylon in downland, and Graham Sutherland's dumps and ruins. Yet, unless we are content with a scenery betokening disintegration, it must be admitted that, under man's guidance, nature is capable of yielding less neurotic scenery. Surely trees in their natural growth have intrinsic beauty, and it is exaggerating the importance of functional and technical factors to equate a natural form with bygone or fake art, because its growth has a freedom which unhappily is denied to mankind. Mr. Ward has pressed "the mechanical fallacy" to its ultimate absurdity.

To urge better considered amenity planting does not deny the need for well forested woodlands. But it expresses the conviction that visual, humane, spiritual values (call them what we may) are no less necessary than the economic and material to man's full well-being; that hardwood trees should be planted or protected instead merely of short-lived blossom trees; and that persons or bodies should not be discouraged from regenerating the humanised landscape (where appropriate) because the age is subject to inhuman forces.—ED.]

A DEVON PACKHORSE BRIDGE

SIR,—Occasionally COUNTRY LIFE publishes photographs of lesser-known packhorse bridges. Enclosed is a photograph of one which I have never before seen mentioned, at Brendon, in North Devon. It is now closed, but the road bridge beyond is in regular use. The use of packhorses continued in these regions far later than in southern England generally, and there are several packhorse bridges, some of them famous, within a radius of twenty miles of Minehead. There are also innumerable old packhorse lanes, many of them disused and largely overgrown.—WESTCOUNTRYMAN, Somerset.

ROUGH JUSTICE

SIR,—A friend of mine from Germany has told me of an occurrence that may interest those of your readers who are students of bird life. In 1941 the two young sons of his cousin, a farmer living in a little village called Marienwaldein, Eastern Germany (now in Poland), noticed that a pair of storks had built a nest on the roof of their house and had laid two eggs. They removed these eggs and replaced them with two goose eggs, and in due course two goslings were hatched, much to the perplexity of the parents. Soon, however, a strange stork arrived and surveyed the situation with gravity and astonishment. Later he was joined by other storks, until the number reached twenty or more. They sat in solemn conclave and judgment for twelve hours and at the end of that time destroyed the two goslings. Then they sat for another long period, apparently pondering the strange scene, and after much debate executed the parent storks, which they presumably considered the perpetrators of this misdeed.—A. P. BALLARD (Major), The Knoll, Peaslake, Surrey.

PETER, THE WILD BOY

SIR,—The history of Peter, the Wild Boy (of whose tomb you published a photograph on June 1), is somewhat uncertain. Apparently he was discovered in 1725 as a boy of twelve or thirteen running wild in the woods of Hanover, and was presented to George I, who happened to be near by with a hunting party. By the King's instructions he was brought to England the following year and placed under the care of Dr. Arbuthnot, but he was found to be untrainable. Subsequently, at the expense of George II, he was boarded with Mr. Thomas Fenns at Broadway Farm, near Berkhamsted, where he died in 1785. The mezzotint (of which I enclose a photograph) by Valentine Green after a painting by Pierre Falconet was engraved about 1770.—GWYN JEFFREYS, 90, Princess Court, Queensway, W.2.

SIR,—With reference to the letter from Miss Jane Herbert concerning Peter, the Wild Boy, it may interest your readers to know that the leather collar referred to is in the possession of Berkhamsted School.—GEORGE A. CATHERALL, The School, Berkhamsted, Hertfordshire.

CHIPPENDALE IN PORTUGAL

SIR,—Has not Mr. Alfred C. Bossom, in his interesting article Coaches of Portugal's Golden Age (May 11), ascribed the wrong year to his statement that Chippendale was the Court Furniture-Maker to King João V? In 1729 he was only twelve years of age. Since it has never before been suggested that Chippendale ever went abroad, it would be of great interest to know what authority Mr. Bossom has for these views; also for the statement that Chippendale first saw the claw-and-ball motif in Lisbon and, on his return, introduced it to England. It has always been understood that Chippendale seldom, if ever, used the claw-and-ball foot in his chairs, and that this motif came from England to Portugal, where, at Oporto, on account of the wine trade, there was a large English colony.—R. W. SYMONDS, 8, Shelley Court, Tite Street, S.W.3.

[Mr. Bossom writes: I think Mr. Symonds has misinterpreted my reference to Chippendale. In two paragraphs I deal with the general splendour of Dom João V's reign (1706-1750), and the King's love and encouragement of skilled craftsmanship. To illustrate the point I mention, among other things, the King's magnificent state coach built in 1729, and that he appointed Thomas Chippendale (1718-1779) Court Furniture-Maker for two years. But the two statements are not connected. It is a well-established fact in Portugal that Chippendale held the appointment of Court Furniture-Maker there for two years. Even to-day his furniture is widely sought and copied in Lisbon. I verified these facts by consulting the National Council of Portugal's book on Portugal, prepared by Mr. E. Rosenthal.—ED.]

COWS OF CHARACTER

SIR,—The delightful account of the cow, Suzette, in your issue of June 8 inspires me to record my experience with a similarly brilliant animal. I was staying at a small hotel on the outskirts of Blair Atholl, in Perthshire, some years ago, when a story about the curious behaviour of a cow in a near-by field was circulated among the visitors, with the result that it became the custom of us all to stroll along the road to watch her on the various occasions when she was reported to be in action. These occurred for the best part of a week at least once and sometimes two or three times daily.

The farmer who owned the field sold a young calf which had been running with its mother. It was taken to a neighbouring farm about three-quarters of a mile away. By persistently breaking loose, and following her offspring, its mother obliged her owner on each occasion to send a man for help and bring her back. There followed a battle of wits between the farmer and the cow. The field in which he tried to confine her was entered by a large and very heavy old iron gate, hung between two stone pillars. right-of-way, it could not be padlocked. It was slightly askew, on account of weak hinges, and the bolt end rested normally and heavily on the ground. The following is a brief summary of the battle:

Round One—The cow hooked a horn under one of the cross-bars; pulled the gate open by walking backwards, and galloped out. Round Two—The farmer brought a number of large stones in a cart and laid them along the foot of the gate, on the inner side. The cow pushed away all the stones with her horns, and opened the gate as she had done before.

Round Three—The farmer decided to bring the bolt into action again. This was rather a troublesome matter for a human being, as it required two hands for lifting the gate six inches—one for holding it in position and one for shooting the bolt into its hole in the stone pillar. The farmer also put back the stones. The cow removed the stones; hooked one horn under a cross-bar; raised the gate an inch or two, but high enough to take its weight off the bolt; turned her head slowly until her other horn came in contact with the bolt and drew it out; lowered the gate to the ground; and then repeated her earlier performance of walking backwards and escaping at a gallop.

My sister and I and others were witnesses of all the details of this contest, which ended, at last, with the disappearance of the cow, inasmuch as the farmer accepted defeat and removed her elsewhere.—CHARLES REITH, 2, Lygon Road, Edinburgh, 9.

AN OAK-APPLE DAY CELEBRATION

SIR,—In the article on Oak-Apple Day celebrations in your issue of May 25 Mr. Rix referred to the custom, which is still observed in the Wiltshire village of Wishford, of processing with oak boughs, shouting, "Grovely and all Grovely," and seemed to be in doubt about the meaning of the cry. I have always understood the ceremony to be an assertion of the villagers' rights to collect wood, for fuel and for other purposes, from Grovely woods, which cover the downs above Wishford.—ELIZABETH ALLSOP (Mrs.), 44, Clarence Road, St. Albans, Hertfordshire.

"MANUFACTURED" LAND

SIR,—At intervals in Connemara are found small fields of "manufactured" land, showing up on the landscape as patches of darker hue, as seen in the accompanying photograph. These deeper patches are made up of alternate layers of sand and seaweed, with any road sweepings at hand, laid on the weathered light grey limestone rock from which the thin covering of peat has been stripped for fuel. On these built-up patches potatoes and other crops are raised, aided by the frequent warm showers from the Atlantic. In this way in the remote districts does the sparse population sustain life.

In the background of the picture may be seen several broken-down cottages, grim reminders of the pestilences that devastated the west of Ireland after the 1846 famine—the Hunger, as it is still called there. The cottages remain as they were left—doors secured, windows boarded up. Roofs have fallen in, and the interiors are weed-choked. The buildings are now beyond repair.—P. MARSDEN, Lytham St. Anne's, Lancashire.

LOGS TO BURN

SIR,—I think I have an even better poem about suitable wood for fires than the one quoted by your correspondent in COUNTRY LIFE of May 18. It runs as follows:

*Beechwood fires are bright and clear
If the logs are kept a year;
Oak logs burn steadily
If the wood is old and dry;
Chestnut's only good they say
If for long it's laid away;
But ash new or ash old
Is fit for a Queen with a crown of gold.
Birch and fir logs burn too fast,
Blaze up bright but do not last;
It is by the Irish said
Hawthorn bakes the sweetest bread;
But ash green or ash brown
Is fit for a Queen with a golden crown.
Elmwood burns like churchyard mould,
E'en the very flames are cold;
Poplar gives a bitter smoke,
Fills your eyes and makes you choke;
Apple-wood will scent your room
With an incense-like perfume;
With an incense-like perfume;
But ash wet and ash dry
For a Queen to warm her slippers by.
—O. L. BOORD (Lieut.-Col.), Fullwood House, Dursford Wood, Petersfield, Hampshire.*

PHOTOGRAPHING WILD LIFE

SIR,—I read with interest in your issue of May 18 the article entitled Big Game the Easier Way. I have recently paid my second visit to the Kruger National Park and found this as interesting as my earlier call. I am in agreement with your correspondent on one or two items but at strong variance with him in his statements that the bush is so dense that one cannot spot game far off and that unless one's camera is fitted with a tele-lens it is impossible to take good photographs.

A LIONESS IN THE KRUGER NATIONAL PARK

See letter: Photographing Wild Life

The enclosed photograph, taken on a normal camera, may be of interest. It was taken through the car window at a distance of not more than three feet. There were within 15 ft. of the car no fewer than six lionesses and two lions. All were reasonably quiet, having, it is believed, killed only a short time previously.—A. E. HEMENS, 29, St. George Street, Hanover Square, W.1.

PORTRAITS OF THE PRESTON CHILDREN

SIR,—It may interest your readers to know that evidence exists for the dates of birth of the three sons of Thomas Preston, of Holker, painted by "J.H." in 1650, more precise than that supplied by Dugdale's Visitation of Lancashire and set out in my article A Mystery Portrait Painter, published in COUNTRY LIFE of September 15, 1950.

The Vicar of Cartmel, the Rev. L. G. F. Dykes, has kindly supplied me with the dates of baptism of the two elder boys, George (March 3, 1645/6) and Thomas (June 20, 1647): these dates agree absolutely with the ages recorded on the picture. There is no entry in the registers of the baptism of the youngest boy, Gilbert, but according to Foster's Alumni Oxonienses he matriculated at Queen's College on August 2, 1667, aged 17, which tallies with his age as recorded on the family group. George matriculated at Brasenose College, Oxford (June 21, 1662, aged 16) and Thomas at St. John's College, Cambridge (March 22, 1664/5, aged 17).

The boys' father was buried at Cartmel on January 9, 1678/9: Foster and Venn (Alumni Cantabrigienses) give this as the date of his death. All that can be read on his memorial inscription in Cartmel church is, so Mr. Dykes tells me, his age and the year of his death, 1678, which means that he died in either late December, 1678, or early January, 1679.—MARGARET R. TOYNBEE, 22, Park Town, Oxford.

THE LONGEVITY OF BIRDS

SIR,—In your issue of May 11, Mr. Richard Perry writes about the house-sparrow. In his article he alludes to a ringed sparrow which was known to survive "to the astonishing age of eleven years."

Apart from those crises in bird life which result in high mortality, for example the wholesale destruction of redwings arriving in times of hard frost and scarcity of food, how seldom does one see the bodies of birds which might be assumed to have died through old age!

If cage birds can be taken as a fair criterion, eleven years can by no means be regarded as exceptional or even as elderly. One of our canaries, at the ripe age of nineteen years, is still hale and hearty, and if one can believe the stories one hears of parrots, they compare favourably with the human race in length of life.

What, therefore, is the expectation of life in birds which survive the attacks of their enemies and those hazards which result in premature decease?—J. H. BARBER, Gorse Cottage, Budleigh Salterton, Devon.

THE WORLD'S HIGHEST WATERFALL

SIR,—In the article entitled Climbers of the Highest Falls in the World (June 1), written by Elsie K. Morton, the authoress quotes Sutherland Falls (1,904 feet total drop), in the South Island of New Zealand, as being the world's highest waterfall. This distinction belongs to Eastern Venezuela's Angel Falls, where the initial drop is 2,648 feet, followed by a secondary fall of 564 feet—making a total of 3,212 feet.

Any reader who is interested in the discovery of this waterfall—only surveyed as recently as 1949—should read the article on it in the November 1949 magazine of the National Geographic Society, Washington.—D. V. HICKS, 66, New North Road, Barkingside, Ilford, Essex.

We are asked to make it clear that at the Royal Windsor Horse Show Mrs. B. H. Mellor's mare, Hurstwood Lonely Lady, was driven by Mr. R. Midgley, not by Mrs. Haydon, as was stated in our issue of May 25.

NEW CARS DESCRIBED

THE FORD CONSUL By J. EASON GIBSON

THE new Ford models, the Consul and the Zephyr, which were first shown at last year's motor show, exemplify the established Ford custom of introducing new models infrequently, but seeing when they are introduced that they are sufficiently advanced to be able to remain in production for many years without change. Both are of similar basic design. I have recently had the opportunity of carrying out an extended test of the smaller engined one—the Consul, and its theoretical promise is borne out under practical conditions.

No chassis frame as such is used on the Consul; instead, the body and basic framework form an integral construction of welded steel, to which the front and rear suspension assemblies are attached. This method of construction gives greater strength for a given weight and also costs less. The independent front suspension is unusual: the wheels are carried on long vertically placed pillars, which incorporate both the coil springs and the telescopic hydraulic dampers; the upper ends of the pillars are held in rubber-mounted roller bearings fixed to the body, and the lower ends are mounted on of it, a great quantity of luggage can be carried. The bodywork is pleasingly free from external trimmings and ornamentation, and the extra-large windscreen and rear window make the car, despite its modest dimensions, feel large and commodious. No armrests are fitted, nor are there any doors pockets, and the one cubby hole is too small for most purposes. The rear seat is carried lower than usual, so that the forward view of the rear passengers is limited.

Only a three-speed gearbox is fitted, a point on which there will be divided opinions, and the lowest gear is not provided with synchromesh, so that double-clutching has to be used if one is engaging bottom gear while on the move. There are many drivers nowadays who have probably no experience of double-clutching. No pedal slots are provided for the brake and clutch pedals; instead, these are attached to the toe board and take effect through master cylinders which work the clutch and the brakes hydraulically. This method has the advantage that neither hot fumes nor cold draughts can enter the driving compartment, and no complicated linkage is required on the clutch-

Not only is the car comfortable at any speed over inferior surfaces, but at maximum speed on long straight stretches—even with varying camber—the action of the suspension does not cause the car to wander in the least. The high level of comfort has been achieved without leading to any pitching or floating. It is when one first attempts fast cornering that the surprising capabilities of this new Ford suspension are revealed. Owing to the extreme lightness of the steering and the softness of the suspension one might reasonably anticipate that the speed at which the car could corner with safety would be very low. In fact, it corners remarkably fast—and is, therefore, a safe car—without the slightest tendency to rolling or straying.

Though it was admittedly driven harder during my tests than most likely purchasers would drive it, I was disappointed with the fuel consumption. A figure of 24.5 m.p.g. does not seem in keeping with the performance or with the requirements of the type of buyer to whom the car will particularly appeal. Throughout my tests it started instantly, whether hot or cold, and the combined choke and fast-running control could be easily set, without fiddling for the first few minutes' running. Even after very hard driving there was no tendency for the engine to run on when switched off.

From a tickover to almost maximum speed the engine was smooth and silent. It was only at maximum engine speed, on either second or top gear, that a slight impression of fussiness was apparent, or, indeed, that wind roar could be heard. The car is certainly at its best on long main-road runs, where the effortless cruising speed can be enjoyed, and, owing to its excellent road-holding and cornering abilities, neither surface variations nor corners forced one to drop from the cruising speed to any extent. Despite the use of a three-speed gearbox and the modest maximum speed, journeys known to the driver can be covered very fast. While that in itself is of little interest to the average driver it is confirmation that the new Consul is a safer and more stable car than its predecessors.

Owing to the immense improvement in handling manifest in this car it should appeal to a much wider market than the earlier Ford models and those purchasers whose previous experience was limited to the 8 or 10 will be surprised at the way in which their average driving speed will increase on it, thanks almost entirely to the greatly improved steering and suspension. It is not only at the higher road speeds that it is pleasant, as the engine can pull at quite low speeds on top gear without conveying the impression that it is being badly treated. Finally, one should bear in mind the very low service charges applicable to this, as to all other Ford products, throughout the world.

THE FORD CONSUL. Notable features are clean unornamented lines, the small amount of chromium plating and the swivelling ventilation panels in the front windows swinging arms. Rear suspension is by long semi-elliptic leaf springs assisted by double-acting hydraulic dampers. An anti-roll bar is fitted to the front suspension.

The four-cylinder engine is fitted with overhead valves—contrary to the earlier Ford practice—and gives a total power of 47 brake-horse-power at 4,400 r.p.m. Though the sump capacity is only 7½ pints, a full-flow filter is incorporated in the lubrication system to retain the purity of the oil for long periods. The gearing used, in conjunction with the dimensions of the engine, enables the theoretical cruising speed to be 73 m.p.h., which places this smallest Ford model in an entirely different class from that of its predecessor. The oil filler is handily placed above the valve-cover box, and the battery, which is carried lengthwise beside the engine, is much more conveniently placed than is usual in these days of alligator-type bonnets. An unusual feature is a vacuum pump, fitted below the petrol pump, which drives the windshield wipers at adjustable speeds.

The body is unusual, even to-day, in that the passenger load is carried very far forward, owing to more than 50 per cent. of the engine's being in front of the centre of the front wheels. Not only are the rear passengers in front of the rear axle, but so far forward are the seats placed that they are in front of the leading edge of the rear wheels. This has made possible the provision of a luggage boot of great size, and, although the spare wheel is carried vertically to one side operating mechanism. In addition to the normal swivelling ventilation panels on the front doors, easily controlled vents are provided, so placed that cooling air can be directed to the floor boards in the front.

On first sitting in the car one notices its resemblance to a large American car, in that both the windscreen and the instrument board are farther from one than usual, which prevents one's feeling at home with the car straight away. The extreme lightness of the clutch pedal, and, in fact, all the controls, strengthens this feeling, but after only a few miles one realises that it is possible to have positive control without the effort required on certain of the cheaper cars. Full marks for easiness of operation must also be given to the steering-column-mounted-gear-lever, which is among the best I have tried. Even before the open road was reached, it was clear that the new Ford suspension works remarkably well; over both cobbled city streets and corrugated suburban roads the ride was smooth and level, and the lightness of the steering made driving in city streets simple and restful.

Though both front wings can be seen from the driving seat, the driving position is not perfect, being rather too reclining for either efficiency or comfort on long runs, and tends to make one sink into a slouching position which can be tiring to the back. The good opinion formed of the springing during the first few miles I covered was confirmed after many miles of driving under widely varying conditions and road surface.

A CAUSERIE ON BRIDGE

BRAINSTORM

By M. HARRISON-GRAY

THIS article is inspired by an episode of some interest in the current series of women's international trials. The object of the latter is to find a team capable of defending our hard-won 1950 title at the next European Championships.

Dealer, East. Both sides vulnerable. Bidding, Room 1:

East	South	West	North
1 Diamond	1 Spade	2 Clubs	2 Spades

Three passes ended an unexciting auction with a logical conclusion. Some would prefer to open One Heart on the East hand, in which case a final contract of Four Hearts might be bid and made. As it was, it looks as though South can make Four Spade tricks, two Diamonds and three Clubs—if she can get at them in time.

But the main interest lies in the play, which lends support to the contention that a deduction of some sort can be drawn from each trick.

West leads the Six of Diamonds, Dummy plays the Three, East the Ace and South the Eight. In spite of this false card, East decides to play for a cross-ruff and returns the Ten of Diamonds, a suit preference signal to suggest that she can regain the lead in Hearts, the higher-ranking side suit.

South wins with the King, still concealing the tell-tale Two, but East is not deceived; for West follows suit with the Four, which denies possession of the Two. South sees the impending cross-ruff and tries to sneak through a low Spade towards Dummy's ten. If the ruse succeeds, another quick round of trumps will draw most of the enemy's teeth.

But West is on the alert and hops up with the Ace. East plays the Six, starting an echo to show that she held three trumps. West returns the Two of Hearts, selecting this card because it suggests the lowest of four. Dummy plays low, East wins with the Knave and gets the timing right by leading her singleton Club. West wins and returns the Three, another suit preference signal asking for a Diamond return. East ruffs this Club, West ruffs a Diamond, and East ruffs another Club. South claims the rest, but is two down for a loss of 200 points.

This defence does not qualify for the adjective brilliant. It merely calls for a certain amount of observation and timing. And now the true facts of the story can be revealed.

On the opening Diamond lead, South in practice played the card nearest her thumb, which happened to be the Two. This was the first of many generous moves. The play of the Eight would at least leave some doubt as to the location of the Two. Few players have gone into the question of the right card for West to play on the second round of Diamonds, from an original holding of 6 4 2. Some prefer the Two, others the Four. The one thing certain was that West would not lead the Six from 8 6 4.

Since the hand was to be a saga of co-operation between attack and defence, South next led the King of Spades—to make quite sure that the Ace would go up on the first round. West took the trick and remembered her partner's Ten of Diamonds lead at trick 2. So she returned a Heart. In order to give East a chance of going wrong, she carefully selected the Ten.

East gratefully acknowledged the gesture by playing the Nine of Hearts after Dummy had played low. This left West on play to lead another Heart. South ruffed, conceded the Ace of Clubs, and claimed nine tricks. Plus 140 instead of minus 200, a turnover of four international match points.

The bidding at the other table was identical, but here the defenders rose to the heights of holding South to eight tricks.

I am not suggesting that this performance will be repeated by our front line of defence at Venice in September. But it may serve to encourage the modest reader who has not hitherto considered trying for a place in one of our national teams.

Strangely enough, this deal turned up towards the end of a neck-and-neck struggle, when both teams could be expected to be well up on their toes. The outcome might well have robbed the losers of a chance of seeing the Grand Canal. It proves once more the peculiar strain of duplicate match play and the difficulty of maintaining concentration throughout the course of a needle match. An even more striking example was provided two years ago by the international men players in a Camrose Cup match between Scotland and Wales.

Dealer, West. Both sides vulnerable.

The contract in Room 1 was Three No-Trumps by North, defeated by two tricks. At the other table South was declarer in the superior contract of Four Spades.

West led the Three of Hearts to East's Ace, and the Nine was returned. South won with the King and summed up the Heart position when the Ten fell from West. So he ruffed a low Heart in Dummy, with the gratifying result that his Knave was now good.

But South came down to earth when it struck him that this play had been a little premature. The lead of his Club at trick 3 would have left more room for manoeuvre. Conscious of his error, he proceeded to suffer a series of brainstorms which collectively must constitute a world record in such a match.

The King of Spades was followed by the Knave, which was allowed to run. West grabbed the trick and got off play with a small Diamond. South spent the rest of the hand with his head bowed in his hands.

At long last he took the plunge and finessed Dummy's Ten of Diamonds. Such was his relief when it held that he overlooked the expediency of overtaking with his Knave. There was a trump still at large and he was locked in Dummy, as it happened, for some time to come. After much further thought the Ace and King of Diamonds were cashed without mishap or specific purpose. This left only Clubs in Dummy, but South was in a far better position than he deserved. The only danger was that East would gain the lead to return a Heart, enabling West to ruff South's Knave with his remaining trump. But a simple safety play was available—the King of Clubs, to minimise the risk. If West had the Ace, as in practice, South's troubles were over.

It seems scarcely credible that a low Club was actually led; and worse was to come. East was smart enough to go in with his Queen, but was so exhausted by the effort that he returned, not a Heart, but the thirteenth Diamond. South's supporters in the gallery, on the point of collapsing under the strain, heaved a great sigh of relief. There was only one small trump outstanding, and South's last four cards were Ace-Ten-Seven of Spades and the master Knave of Hearts. He could ruff with the Ten and spread his hand for the rest.

But time stood still while South considered the position. At last he reached a decision. With more confidence than he had yet shown, he ruffed the Diamond lead firmly with the Seven of Spades.

And South was a player with a long and honourable record in international play.

THE ESTATE MARKET

AVINGTON FOR AUCTION

AVINGTON PARK, the late Sir John Shelley-Rolls's home, near Winchester, which is to be auctioned on the 20th of next month, is a house that is singularly rich in historical associations. It was reconstructed around the core of an Elizabethan house in about 1682 by George Rodney Brydges, a gentleman of Charles II's Bedchamber, and it is likely that the decision to rebuild and extend the original mansion was governed by the fact that in that same year the King laid the foundation stone of his own great palace at Winchester. Not only was it convenient for members of the Royal household to have an imposing house of their own near the Court, but Brydges had an added reason, for at that time he was "hot in suit" of the notorious Anna Maria, widow of the 11th Earl of Shrewsbury and mistress of George Villiers, 2nd Duke of Buckingham, who had killed her husband in a duel. Although Buckingham, having retired from public life, was no longer a rival, it is doubtful whether in normal circumstances so comparatively obscure a courtier as Brydges could have hoped for more than temporary favours from "La Shrewsbury," but, as Mr. Christopher Hussey observed when writing of Avington in COUNTRY LIFE some years ago, "the fact that Mr. George Brydges possessed an estate with, moreover, a house only a few miles from the favoured city raised his value in the Countess's eyes, and his suit, which we may imagine had been hitherto more in the nature of an amour, as suddenly prospered and led to the altar."

The auction of Avington will be conducted by Messrs. James Harris & Son, of Winchester,

TWICE SOLD TO PAY DEATH DUTIES

IN these days, when one hears that a large estate has come into the market, it is axiomatic that one should suspect death duties as having conditioned the sale. In the case of Carskely, a well-known agricultural property of 3,400 acres on the Mull of Kintyre, which is due to be auctioned in September by Messrs. Jackson-Stops and Staff's Leeds office, such supposition is proved correct for a second time within three years. In 1948 the estate was sold to provide for death duties and was bought by Mr. Wilfrid Appleyard, a Yorkshire corn miller. Now Mr. Appleyard himself has died and the property is once again on the market.

The estate is situated at the southern end of the Mull of Kintyre, and the principal house, built in 1905 by an Italian architect, is within 14 miles of the Irish mainland.

Carskely is an excellent rough shoot, having been well kept. The pheasant shooting is particularly good, and there are plentiful snipe, woodcock, grouse and golden plover, as well as duck fighting along the coast. The district is also popular with ornithologists, and the golden eagle, osprey, waxwing, marsh-harrier and peregrine have all been seen there.

Two sizeable properties come up for auction next week. On Monday, Messrs. Knight, Frank and Rutley and Messrs. Walker Barnard and Son will submit the Clifford Manor estate of 1,072 acres, near Stratford-on-Avon. The property, which will be offered as a whole or in lots, includes a country house with Elizabethan and Queen Anne features, five smaller houses, several farms and 45 cottages. On the following Saturday Messrs. Hampton and Sons and Messrs. Francis Hornor and Son, of Norwich, will submit St. Faith's, the late Mr. J. T. Spurrell's estate, near Norwich. St. Faith's extends to 1,455 acres and includes a manor house, nine mixed farms, three smallholdings and accommodation land.

You're a very moderate driver — so you always say. There's no hurry, 40 gets you there as quickly as 60.

But then, as that bigger-engined car bundles past, something in you puts more pressure on the throttle. The Javelin responds instantly. You re-pass.

But you've taken on a powerful opponent. You sit a little straighter in your seat — glance in the driving mirror. Yes, he's there.

You're cruising fast now, snicking into top after maximum in third. And you love the way she behaves. Gripping the corners as though on rails.

Nearly flat out and still perfectly in control — wheel rock-steady. Brakes seeming just to suck you back and the torsion bar suspension cushioning the road.

You keep it up for quite a time. But on the straight he passes you finally. You knew he would, but you're happy — with a 1½ litre family saloon you held all his litres. And that little bit of fun didn't run away with your petrol — the Javelin's an economical car even at speed.

This car is a waste of money if you don't care what a car does. There's such a lot built into it that doesn't really show until you have it in your hands — performance, comfort and 30 m.p.g.

AVINGTON PARK, WINCHESTER: THE ENTRANCE FRONT

scure a courtier as Brydges could have hoped for more than temporary favours from "La Shrewsbury," but, as Mr. Christopher Hussey observed when writing of Avington in COUNTRY LIFE some years ago, "the fact that Mr. George Brydges possessed an estate with, moreover, a house only a few miles from the favoured city raised his value in the Countess's eyes, and his suit, which we may imagine had been hitherto more in the nature of an amour, as suddenly prospered and led to the altar."

Sir Christopher Wren being already engaged at Winchester and elsewhere, and speed being all-important, Brydges himself supplied much of the design for the new house, including the portico, which is probably the first example on an English country house. It is likely that he borrowed the idea from Inigo Jones's portico of St. Paul's Church, Covent Garden, and substance is lent to this belief by the fact that he owned property in the neighbourhood. A banqueting hall was also incorporated in the new Avington, but it has long since disappeared; indeed, most of Brydges's Carolean exterior has been obscured by a skin of red brick which gave the house its present, predominantly Georgian appearance. This was done, together with much redecoration of the interior, towards the end of the 18th century by Brydges's kinsman, the 2nd Duke of Chandos, as part of a scheme to emulate Cannons, his father's grandiose home near London.

SHELLEY DISINHERITED

ON the duke's death, in 1789, Avington passed to his daughter's husband, Earl Temple, but in 1848 it left the Brydges family altogether when it was acquired, with most of the contents, by John Shelley, younger brother of the poet. The purchase money was part of the fortune left him by his father. This fortune would

FARMING NOTES

PATCHY CORN CROPS

MANY farmers were in such a hurry to take advantage of the first possible weather for corn sowing that the job was rushed, as we can now see from the appearance of many fields. One of the worst examples strikes my eye each day. The top end of a field was sown with barley and the bottom part, heavier ground, was to be sown soon afterwards with a silage mixture. Someone knocked down the marking-stick and so there is an irregular gap, neither rectangle nor triangle, half-way across the field. This piece has been patched with barley now, but all through the season it will be a reminder of scamped work. Plenty of other fields I see with the marks of half a drill width missed. It is all deplorable, but even so we managed to cover an extraordinary acreage in a few days, trying to catch up with the calendar. Most of the spring barley looks well, but it is impossible yet to say how much barley has been planted as a straight crop and how much as dredge for stock-feeding. There is uncertainty too about this season's market prices for malting barley. The intention was that there should be a minimum of 100s. and the maximum of 140s. a quarter according to the terms of the gentlemen's agreement between the N.F.U. and the brewers, maltsters and distillers. But this price range seemed too low after the Government had fixed the minimum price for feeding barley at 87s. 4d. and the maximum price at 104s. a quarter for this year's crop. The parties could not agree on prices acceptable to all and so the malting barley trade will this autumn again be a game of "catch as catch can."

Egg Production

SUPPLIES received by the local egg packing station still run markedly below last year's level. I doubt whether we shall see a recovery in home egg production for some time to come. Ministers were too precipitate in saying that expansion had gone far enough and giving warnings that the spring egg price would be lowered. The drop is not in fact to be severe and the packing station price next March will be 3s. a dozen, instead of the 3s. 6d. we had last March. The winter price goes up to 6s. and the average price for the year is to be 4s. 3½d. a dozen. What has happened is that some producers, making a rapid reckoning, decided to kill off their laying birds at the end of March and during April, when they were worth 15s. or 16s., rather than collect a dozen or two more eggs from each hen, meet increased feeding-stuffs bills and then dispose of their birds now at the height of summer when they go out of lay. They took a gamble on the market for hens, and the present price of 8s., which is all I am offered for Rhode Island Reds killing at about 5 lb., has proved them right. But those who like to talk about the vital importance of maintaining home food production at the highest possible level cannot boast about this achievement.

Rural Sociology

VARIOUS aspects of country life now and in the past will be the theme of two courses that are to be held at Westham House at Barford, Warwickshire. The arrangements have been made jointly by the Association of Agriculture and Westham House Residential College with particular concern for students from overseas. The Association is also holding several such courses in different parts of the country. The subjects are Man and the Land at Perth; Man and his Food at Shuttleworth College, Biggleswade; Biology and Agriculture at Harper Adams College, Shropshire, and The Content and Teaching of Rural

Science at Trinity College, Carmarthen. The idea throughout is to cater for teachers who can use the lessons of the land in the classroom. It may sound rather far removed from practical farming, but it does matter that the teachers in a predominantly urban community should understand something about life in the country and the basic industry of agriculture.

Herbicides

HERBICIDES is a new word to me. I take it from an article in the Journal of the Yorkshire Agricultural Society by Professor G. E. Blackman and Mr. U. K. Woodford, of Oxford University, who write "During the last decade the increase in arable land and the extensive use of combine harvesters has resulted in the growth and spread of weeds which under our old farming methods would never have seen the light of day. Cultural methods of weed control, although still the basis of good husbandry are no longer sufficient and herbicides have come to take their place beside the plough and the hoe." Herbicides are chemical weed killers which go by the initials DNOC, MCPA and DCPA. In using them we must ring the changes. The continued use of a single type of herbicide will encourage the growth of the resistant weeds, which may in the end become more troublesome than the mixed weeds that were there before.

Age of Shepherds

NEARLY half the shepherds in Scotland have been in the same station for more than five years and just over one-fifth of them have been on the same farm for over ten years. Shepherds seem to be more mobile in the Borders, where there are more young men, and less mobile in the north-east of Scotland. The proportion of young shepherds is high on the average in Border counties, but the majority of shepherds in Scotland are middle-aged. Decline in the number of shepherds over the age of 55 is markedly greater than that shown for all farm-workers, owing, no doubt, to the natural tendency for the older shepherds to take up less arduous work. This is particularly true on the hill farms, where the shepherd must have a pair of sound legs and be able to cover many miles of rough country.

Humus Husbandry

MR. FRIEND SYKES, who farms on the eastern edge of Salisbury Plain, is well known as a protagonist of humus, that is decomposing organic matter, as the source of soil fertility and an opponent of artificial fertilisers, particularly sulphate of ammonia and anything else made with sulphuric acid. In his new book, Food, Farming and the Future (Faber, 21s.), he airs his views again, describing some of the methods used at Chute. He writes: "The main pivot of the whole system, as regards both the fertility of the land and the economic use of labour, is the four-year deep-rooting ley." This is comforting news for many of us who have long pursued alternate cropping—leys for grazing and grain for cash—as the surest means of developing and maintaining a reasonably high level of soil fertility that will make farming pay. Mr. Friend Sykes allows the use of basic slag initially where a soil is very poor, but superphosphate, a quicker acting product, is taboo because sulphuric acid is used in its manufacture. The important matter surely is to establish the chain of fertility by growing a good enough ley to carry a heavy head of stock that will leave plenty of organic manure to sustain the cereal crops grown after the ley. The experience of most farmers shows that the fertiliser bag used with discretion can help.

CHANCES OF WRONG MURDER VERDICTS

Reviews by HOWARD SPRING

MR. EDGAR LUSTGARTEN'S Defender's Triumph (Wingate, 10s. 6d.) is about four murder trials. "I do not suggest," the author says in a foreword, "that any of the prisoners should have been convicted. I do suggest that all of them would have been convicted had they not been shielded by remarkable defenders."

This is a disconcerting thought. All these four, Mr. Lustgarten says, were entitled to the verdict of not guilty, but only the exceptional brilliance of their counsel gained that

If Clarke brought pure intellectual passion to his work, and Marshall Hall a flickering torchlight that trembled often on the edge of melodrama, one cannot imagine Patrick Hastings or Norman Birkett either weeping or enjoying the spectacle of a street commotion. Mr. Lustgarten, advancing his theory that "every outstandingly successful advocate is to some degree the creation of his age," sees in Patrick Hastings the forensic counterpart of Gerald du Maurier, attaining triumph by a refusal to verdict for them. This adds point to Lord Templewood's recent book on capital punishment, in which one of the arguments is that men may be wrongly convicted. "One cannot ignore," Mr. Lustgarten says, "disquieting phenomena that are likely to recur in any year of our own lives."

THE HARDEST JOB

Of the four cases here dealt with, the one in which, it seemed to me, defending counsel had the hardest job was that of Adelaide Bartlett, who in 1886 was charged with the murder of her husband. Sir Edward Clarke secured her acquittal, and there was a sequel which Mr. Lustgarten does not mention. It is referred to in Mr. E. W. Fordham's Notable Cross-examinations. Mr. Fordham says that Lord Chief Justice Coleridge wrote to Sir Edward Clarke congratulating him on the result of the case, and adding: "I hear a good thing attributed to Sir James Paget—that Mrs. Bartlett was no doubt quite properly acquitted, but now it is to be hoped in the interests of science she will tell us how she did it."

Though, here, each case is presented in a way that holds the reader's attention from beginning to end, it is not the case in itself that is Mr. Lustgarten's chief concern. The central figure is not the accused person but the man entrusted with the defence. How different these four are! Sir Edward Clarke, Sir Edward Marshall Hall, Sir Patrick Hastings, Sir Norman Birkett. When Mrs. Bartlett was acquitted, Clarke wept in court, and outside the court the crowds surrounded his carriage and ran with it along Holborn, cheering wildly. At the theatre that night he was greeted with cheers again. There were frenzied scenes, too, when Marshall Hall secured Robert Wood's acquittal. Traffic was held up in the streets, and it seemed, Marshall Hall said, "less like the end of a trial than the result of an election."

over-act. "I have always hated trials for murder," Hastings himself wrote; but it was as defender in the sensational case of Elvira Barney that he here appears. His final plea for Mrs. Barney, utterly without emotion, lucid and intellectual, was called by the judge, Travers Humphreys, "one of the finest speeches I have ever heard delivered at the Bar." As for Norman Birkett, whose "record of remarkable acquittals," Mr. Lustgarten thinks, "has never been surpassed," one cannot read far into the case of Tony Mancini without admiration for the combined qualities of heart and head that he brought to his work. Altogether, Mr. Lustgarten has written a most readable book and raised at least one point of general interest and importance: that is the right of the Crown—sometimes waived—to have the last word. The last word has a profound effect on the mind of the jury. Is it fair to the accused that this word should be with the prosecution? In two of the cases here dealt with, defending counsel suggested that it was not. Mr. Lustgarten thinks the rule might be reconsidered. "If the argument the jury have most lately heard is one against the prisoner, and not on his behalf, that tends to place him at a disadvantage—precisely what our system is intended to avoid."

CONSTANCE SPRY'S ART

Mrs. Constance Spry is the acknowledged head of what has become both a trade and an art—that is the effective arranging of cut flowers in vases. Her new book Summer and Autumn Flowers (Dent, 21s.) contains innumerable photographs of beautiful flower arrangements and some excellent writing about them. It is impossible to visit the flower-shows without being aware of Mrs. Spry's influence in this department of horticultural work. There is usually nowadays a class or two for flower arrangements, and to look at most of them is to find

FAMOUS HOUSES AND THEIR OWNERS

Sixteen Portraits (Naldrett Press, 18s.), edited by L. A. G. Strong, is published for the National Trust, which now has many famous houses in its keeping. What sort of people were they who lived in these houses and whose association with them has made it desirable that the houses should be maintained? The book answers the question. Each of these worthies is dealt with by a different writer; and now when you look at the Lake District farm where Beatrix Potter lived, or at the Sussex Manor house that knew Kipling, or the small cottage to which Lawrence of Arabia retired, you can read what kind of people they were who in those places rode out some part of the mortal storm. Soldiers, scientists, statesmen, inventors, painters, poets, novelists: here the sixteen are: and the National Trust is to be congratulated on having found writers who are sympathetically attuned to the job in hand.

Mr. Nevil Shute's books are at their best when at their most shallow. Give him the externals of life, action with no particular reference to the springs of action, and he can be, on that level, enthralling. I know of no other English novelist now writing who has such a knack of dragging the reader along by the scruff of the neck and making him enjoy it.

In his new novel Round the Bend (Heinemann, 12s. 6d.) he has tried to go deeper, and, I think, has utterly failed. Tom Cutter, who tells the story, has us in his grip when he is dealing with factual matters, in this case the building up of his air-line in the Persian Gulf: from next door to nothing to a successful concern with immense goods-carrying planes ranging to Bali, Timor and Darwin. But when we come to his Number One mechanic, Connie Shaklin, whose father was Chinese and mother Russian, we are all at sea. We are asked to see Connie as the founder of a new religion which spread through the East and influenced men so deeply that one of his devotees, a wealthy Moslem ruler, was anxious to place £4,000,000 at his disposal to spread the new word.

One does not feel a flicker of conviction in any of it. Not for a moment is Connie given any quality, any aura, any sense of being what could with truth be called "inspired." He was a nice boy who preached to the mechanics that they could serve God by doing their jobs efficiently. As no doubt they could. Cutter attributed much of his success to employing nothing but Asiatic labour which didn't ask for European wages. And with Cutter keeping the wages down and Connie keeping the morale up, they did very well. But I don't see that they did any more than that.

AN INTRODUCTION TO ANTIQUES

GLASS, porcelain, furniture, pottery... it would be a sad state of affairs if the questions of even the veriest amateur on these fascinating subjects could be answered in some 170 pages of a half-guinea book. Antiques, the Amateur's Questions, by Hampden Gordon (John Murray, 10s. 6d.) may well be considered on its merits as a stimulus to further study rather than an answer to the problems that confront the tyro collector, the more so since a considerable amount of space is devoted to a précis of the views of current writers on the historical aspect of the subjects, as distinct from the practical collector's angle. Thus in furniture, for instance, the modern attitude to the work of Chippendale, Sheraton and their fellows is set forth, but with the limited space available the author cannot do much to guard the tyro from the 19th-century copy, let alone the modern reproduction. Nevertheless, his contribution is much to be preferred to the outmoded views found in current reprints of certain books first published a quarter of a century ago, and he satisfactorily answers many of the questions liable to be asked. English furniture, glass and ceramics are briefly surveyed in 158 of the 174 pages. The remaining space is devoted to the common trends in other aspects of industrial art.

Inevitably, the specialist in any of the subjects treated is liable to find inaccuracies and in some instances the author might bring his information more up-to-date: as long ago as 1900 the old theory regarding glass in Roman Britain was outmoded by excavations at Wilderspool, Warrington. Four pages are devoted to the discussion of reproduction glass.

The chapter on English porcelain emphasises the difficulties which beset the beginner in the attribution of unmarked pieces. The value of what the author has termed "total effect" in connection with 18th-century porcelain has been neglected by most other writers. Few amateur collectors are aware of the necessity for co-ordinating paste, glaze, shape, modelling, style of decoration and details of painting.

Regarding furniture, Mr. Hampden Gordon points out that, as a rule, periods and styles of furniture are not sharply defined, but are gradually merged, the chasm of difference being bridged over by transitional pieces displaying characteristics of the old and the new styles. He gives useful detail to the Regency furniture now popular, and in these as in the other chapters the amateur will find many valuable pointers to the study of English antiques. G. B. H.

CATHEDRAL ABBEY

SINCE Henry VIII permitted the destruction of the abbeys of Saint Augustine at Canterbury and St. Edmund at Bury, we are fortunate in still possessing that third great church associated with the early history of Christianity in this country, St. Albans, which looks back even farther than the other two—to Roman times and the persecution of Diocletian. Thanks to the burgesses of St. Albans who in 1553 bought the church from the Crown it has survived to become the see of a new diocese.

In Portrait of St. Albans Cathedral (Phoenix House, 15s.) Mr. G. H. Cook gives an admirably clear and accurate account of its history and architecture up to that grievous 19th-century phase when the fabric, admittedly in a shaky condition, was taken in hand by Lord Grimthorpe. Yet, when one has recovered from the shock of the west front and the transept windows, it is astonishing how much lovely mediæval craftsmanship remains—the paintings in the nave, the delicate chantry chapels, the reassembled shrines and the watching loft, the carved reredos and the painted roof of the presbytery. All this and much more is illustrated by 70 photographs in half-tone, maintaining the high standard set in earlier volumes in the series. A. S. O.

CARBON

Carbon is one of the most widely distributed of the elements, for it is an essential constituent of all living matter. Carbon appears in the crystalline form as diamond and graphite and in the amorphous form as charcoal. Combined with other elements it gives innumerable chemicals all of which are vital to our existence. Carbon atoms readily join with each other, and with those of other elements. They will link up into rings, form long chains of atoms like strings of beads, and even branch out to make complex three-dimensional molecules. The study of carbon compounds is so important that it has become a specialized branch of science known as Organic Chemistry. Hundreds of thousands of different molecules have already been made from carbon atoms in conjunction with those of two or three other elements, such as hydrogen, nitrogen and oxygen. An almost infinite number of new ones remain to be discovered by the organic chemist.

Since 1856, when Sir William H. Perkin made the first synthetic dye, mauve, the manufacture of dyestuffs has been a focal point of the organic chemical industry. The dyestuffs made by I.C.I. are carbon compounds, and recent I.C.I. research into carbon derivatives has resulted in such epoch-making discoveries as new anti-malarial drugs, new textile fibres like 'Ardil', and 'Gammexane,' a revolutionary insecticide.

MIDSUMMER — and afterwards

A cape in Canadian squirrel dyed a deep glossy cocoa brown has the pelts joining to form a chevron. There are two slits for the arms and two pockets, hidden in the front. The National Fur Company

FASHION trends for the early autumn displayed in the collections of the great wholesalers held during the Fashion Fortnight re-establish the strapless picture dress for evening as top favourite, the waisted look on tailor-mades and one-sided drapery on afternoon frocks. But the tight up-and-down skirt is mitigated by a hint of fluid movement at the back of the skirts on the best of the tailored suits or by a similar break in front, and there are also many knife-pleated skirts among the simple wool dresses intended for the transition period during August and early autumn.

The wide-skirted picture frock with a strapless bodice, brief, boned and tightly fitting, is shown in all its glory of tulle, lace, brocade, polished satin and organza, and few styles have ever been so becoming. The tulle, petticoat upon petticoat, are gathered into the tight little bodices. Some burst into a cascade of ruffles front or back; others are gored and circular over their stiff silk underskirts.

Ninety-nine per cent. of the evening dresses have been long; the short evening dress is out of the picture, except as a restaurant dress, and then it is hardly ever a décolleté dress. Newest among the theatre and restaurant outfits, also designed for cocktail time, are the three-pieces of Frederick Starke. He shows sleek fur spencers in mink tails or moleskin over dresses of dark velvet or rich jewelled silks, long-sleeved and svelte. Over this he puts a fitted full-length, full-skirted coat in one of the waffle silks threaded with metal thread and chenille. The design is simple and useful, as all the component parts can be worn on their own. The coats, in particular, would be charming as summer coat-frocks for garden parties, or over a pale summer frock.

Susan Small are selling light canvas petticoats to give the correct amplitude of skirt, short ones to cover the hips for some of their short cocktail dresses, full-length ones for the robes de style. Frederick Starke has invented what he terms a cartol, a resilient horsehair "shape" that holds the skirt in position by a new technique, without resorting to an authentic crinoline hoop. The skirts of his graceful frocks certainly move beautifully and attain an attractive bell silhouette. One in a fragile black organza over stiff white ottoman silk had a trail of pale pink roses at the waist—a most glamorous affair. A coffee-coloured lace possesses a billowing skirt in two tiers and is so full that it curves into the waistline without the aid of padding or hoop.

Susan Small show a bouffant black tulle under a black velvet overskirt and bodice lightly studded with diamanté. This top layer comes off, when it makes an elegant evening cape, the stiffened bodice forming a calyx collar. Orchid mauve, fragile black lace and tulle are used for a most romantic design, while gleaming taffetas with swathed fichu tops or boleros have been designed for the young girls who need an inexpensive dance dress or a bridesmaid-cum-party frock. A dear little jacket in this collection is most practical, a cherry red velveteen hanging straight to the hips and tying under the chin—the sort of jacket that can be worn by either day or night.

New fabrics at these autumn displays are gorgeous. Matt-surfaced

Stiebel's débutantes' ball dress in chalk-white organza features an immense lampshade skirt caught by a hoop at knee-level. Multi-coloured striped taffeta ribbon makes the swathed bodice and long sash ends that stream to the ground. Jacquemar

A summer dinner dress in rayon jersey in a bold design of leaves, orchids and ferns on a white ground. This becoming dress does not crush and packs admirably. Horrockses silks with a waffle weave threaded with metal and chenille have been shown in deep rich garnet reds and greens with the sheen of velvets. Velvets with an attractive deep glossy pile have been rendered waterproof, which makes them highly practical for evening coats and town suits. They have a lush richness and manage to retain all their softness of texture through the waterproofing process. Excellent afternoon and cocktail suits in this velvet have been shown in dark jade green, a lovely shade with mink, either the coffee brown mink or the silver blue. The fragile laces on their own or combined with tulle or laid on satin or poulte have been outstanding. Nylon gauzes woven in layers, a dark with a light, are held together by the all-over damask-like designs in a shadow effect that is most attractive. A mixture of fine wool and silk also shows a brand-new technique; the effect is of a fine tracery of coarse silky lace being laid on a matt-surfaced wool ground, but the fabric is woven all together. Marcus featured it for an elegant afternoon dress with an apron front.

At the huge Cotton Board show held in London for overseas visitors, the fine cottons in the most sophisticated and elegant of patterns designed for evening took the honours. Actually some of the jacquard cottons woven for simple summer frocks were equally interesting if less spectacular at a big parade.

The sun, moon and stars, with a few comets, made an astronomical print with the heavenly bodies cast about on the midnight blue ground of the airy cotton. One of the fine Robia voiles of Tootal, black with an almost imperceptible trellis pattern in drawn thread work, was used for an elegant strapless frock with a wide gored skirt. A garden party frock in white organdie was in the Gainsborough tradition with a fichu top and a shady hat also in white organdie with a fluted fluffy brim in layer upon layer.

Among the day dresses, the sky-blue cotton of Susan Small looked particularly fresh. The fabric was one of the Everglaze cottons of Marchington's, embossed with a minute all-over geometric design, the dress simply made with an inch or two of sleeve, a full box-pleated skirt and gold shoe buttons down the bodice. A black piqué dress by Horrockses shown with a dramatic black piqué hat of Aage Thaarup, the wide brim lined with a brilliant scarlet plaid cotton, featured the low oval neckline and had flaring white piqué cuffs round the armholes.

The geometric patterns and the plain cottons with an almost imperceptible weave interest have largely replaced the simple florals that ran rife for so long among the daytime cottons. The cottons designed for the couture houses are featuring immense irregular designs in unbelievably sheer weaves.

Numerous fur fabrics contributed to the gaiety of the day clothes during the Fashion Fortnight. Mock mink as full-length coats were a far cry from their humble woollen origin; they were equally a far cry from legitimate mink, but soft and becoming nevertheless. Mock ocelot has been used to line waterproofed gabardine coats, which seems an excellent idea of Aquascutum. There are plenty of days in England which require a warm waterproof and the fur linings come out when one wants. Continuing this theme, one of the newest Dannimacs is shown with a detachable quilted silk lining. It has been especially designed for wear at race meetings.

Prominent among the coatings shown for autumn are the thick mohair cloths and combinations of wool with mohair. The frosted effect achieved by the mohair is charming, especially among the "charcoal" blacks, where a deep dark blue is woven in to give a "broken" black. This will appeal to many people who find that dead black dims their colouring.

P. JOYCE REYNOLDS.

The moulded silhouette in coarse white lace of a leaf design over pale pink. The wide pale pink taffeta ribbon ties at the back in an immense butterfly bow, the loops of which can make folded elbow sleeves, the sash ends falling to the hem. Frederick Starke from Harrods

Dining with Dignity

This suite in fine oak has a natural dignity. Simple and compact, it has been specially designed for the modern home. Focus centres naturally on the expanding table, where six people may be seated in comfort. Behind this, stands the ideally useful sideboard with its four drawers, and two cupboards. The four strong chairs which complete the suite are covered in an attractive tweed tapestry which adds extra pleasure to dining in dignity.

And besides, it comes from Lee Longlands!

Welcome to the Inns of Britain
beer is best

Issued by the Brewers' Society, 42 Portman Square, London, W.1

THE purpose of signs is to tell without words. Here is a sign known to connoisseurs since 1742. It stands for a whisky as soft as the dew, with a heart of softly-glowing fire. As noble a Scotch as any that ever came from Scotland.

LOTUS Veldtschoen

Waterproof
Guaranteed

"I bought my Lotus Veldtschoen twenty-two years ago and have worn them every winter since. I have worn these boots in snow storms, climbed mountains in the Lake District, and walked twenty miles in a day over rough country roads. In spite of their age, they are still in good condition and I wear them in wet weather."

Designed and made to master every vagary of climate.

Famous the world over for their long and reliable service. Made in Northampton, England.
